Thoughtful men have long seen the danger lying in the overemphasis of manufacturing and commerce, resulting in our becoming more and more a nation of city dwellers. Our laws have unduly enhanced the importance of these industries, and agriculture has been robbed of its dignity along with part of its just remuneration. The result is, in the case of many of the older States, not merely a relative but an absolute decrease in the number of farmers, while the cities have increased immensely in population. I have not been able to get figures from the last census for all the States with reference to this, but I have from some of the States. In Massachusetts there were 1,203 fewer farmers in 1910 than in 1900, and by farmer I mean the person who operates the farm. This is a decrease of 3 per cent. In Missouri there were 8,805 fewer in 1910 than 10 years previous; in New Hampshire, 2,411; in New Jersey, 1,489; in New York, 12,070; in Ohio, 5,336; in Pennsylvania, 5,854; in Vermont, 506; in Connecticut, 517; and in Illinois, 13,298 fewer farmers than in 1900. In other words, there were that many fewer farms in each State. Even in Minnesota there was almost a standstill, the increase in 10 years being only 1,100. It might be thought that the decrease in the number of farms might be due to a tendency toward larger farms, but the reports show that the acreage in farms has also decreased in all of the above-named States. The figures which I have obtained so far show the following decreases in the acreage of farms in different States: Illinois, 324,000 acres; Connecticut, 136,000 acres; California, 946,000 acres; West Virginia, 694,000 acres; Vermont, 71,000 acres; Utah, 763,000 acres; Pennsylvania, 825,000 acres; Ohio, 428,000 acres; New York, 650,000 acres; New Jersey, 279,000 acres; New Hampshire, 368,000 acres; Missouri, 518,000 acres; Massachusetts, 277,000 acres. These 13 States show decreases in farm acreages of more than 6,000,000 acres. These figures are preliminary and may not quite correspond with the final figures, but it is not thought that the changes will be material. To how large an amount the States for which I have no figures will bring the total I have no way of estimating. These figures are enough to show that the number of farmers in the older States is decreasing and that farms are being abandoned.

The population figures for the country, by counties, also indicate the same fact. In Ohio, for instance, there was a decrease in 39 out of 88 counties; in Illinois, in 50 out of 102; in Indiana, in 56 out of 92; in Michigan, in 26 out of 83; in Wisconsin, in 19 out of 70; in Iowa, in 71 out of 99; in Missouri, in 71 out of 115; in Nebraska, in 21 out of 90; in Kansas, in 33 out of 105; and even in Minnesota there was a decrease in 27 counties out of 82. In the counties where there are increases instead of decreases, this was often due to the fact that cities of some size were situated in them.

In view of these facts, would it not be the part of wisdom to carefully scrutinize all legislation that may affect the farmer and to refuse our sanction to measures, whether drafted by the President or not, which may affect him injuriously? The Country Life Commission, in making its report, said:

> Notwithstanding an almost universal recognition of the importance of agriculture to the maintenance of our people there is nevertheless a widespread disregard of the rights of the men who own and work the land. This results directly in social depression, as well as in economic disadvantage.
> The organized and corporate interests represented in mining, manufacturing, merchandising, transportation, and the like, seem often to hold the idea that their business may be developed and exploited without regard to the farmers, who should, however, have an equal opportunity for enjoyment of the land, forests, and streams, and of the right to buy and sell in the open markets without prejudice.

The commission further says:

> We find that there is need of a new general attitude toward legislation, in the way of safeguarding the farmer's natural rights and interests. It is natural that the organized and consolidated interests should be strongly in mind in the making of legislation. We recommend that the welfare of the farmer and countryman be also kept in mind in the construction of laws. We specially recommend that his interests be considered and safeguarded in any new legislation on the tariff, on regulation of railroads, control or regulating of corporations, and of speculation, river, swamp, and forest legislation, and public-health regulations. At the present moment it is especially important that the farmer's interests be well considered in the revision of the tariff. One of the particular needs is such an application of the reciprocity principle as to open European markets for our flour, meats, and live cattle. One of the great economic problems of our agriculture is how to feed the corn crop and other grains profitably, for it must be fed if the fertility of the land is to be maintained; to dispose of the crop profitably requires the best markets that can be secured.

This commission said in 1908 that it was "especially important that the farmer's interests be well considered in the revision of the tariff." That "one of the particular needs is such an application of the reciprocity principle as to open European markets for our flour, meats, and live cattle." That "to dispose of the crop profitably requires the best markets that can be secured." One can not but be struck by the difference between the views of this commission, consisting of able and thoughtful men, who had investigated the conditions surrounding farm life, and had an idea of its needs on these questions as compared with those of the present administration and other supporters of this measure. This administration does not seem to think that the interests of the farmer should be well considered in the revision of the tariff. This administration does not appear to believe that there is any need of applying the reciprocity principle so as to extend the market of our farm products in Europe. This administration does not appear to believe that there is any need or desirabiltiy of conserving the markets of the farmer at home, to say nothing about extending his markets abroad. The reciprocity agreement which this administration is trying to force through Congress extends the market of the Canadian farmer at the expense of the American farmer, and increases the profits of the Beef Trust, the millers, and the railroads.

It has been urged that the American farmer ought to be willing to accept this measure for a year's trial, at the end of which it is intimated that it may be repealed if it does not work satisfactorily—and some of the administration's supporters have pointed to the willingness of the President to agree to this and the unwillingness of the farmers to do so as a proof of the reasonableness of the one and the unreasonableness of the other. It would seem unnecessary to call anyone's attention to the fact that the President and the farmers are in far different positions so far as this proposition is concerned, but it seems that it is necessary in this debate to call attention to a good many things that everyone knew and understood until this reciprocity agreement was sent hurtling into Congress. If this measure becomes a law and works badly—if its effects are injurious, as the farmers have reason to believe they will be—how will that affect the President? At most it will mean only a loss of prestige. But how will it affect the farmer? In the three wheat States, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, the loss on wheat alone, if the price is decreased 10 cents a bushel, will in average years be from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000.

On flax the loss to the North Dakota farmers, if the price is lowered to the amount of the present tariff, will be over $4,000,000. Witnesses before the Finance Committee testified to the belief that such an experiment would cost the farmers of these three States at least $40,000,000 a year, and the farmers of the entire country $300,000,000 a year. Has the farmer of this country been hoarding wealth to such an extent that he should be subjected to the possibility of losing hundreds of millions of dollars in order that an administration may see how some pet scheme will work? Is not the statement that this measure can be repealed at the end of a year and that the farmer ought to be content to accept it on these terms the bitterest mockery? The farmers all over the country are opposed to this measure. If they can not prevent it from becoming a law at this time what reason is there to believe that they will be able to secure its repeal at the end of a year? Will any Senator here tell me? Has the President shown himself so willing to listen to the representations of the farmers in regard to this measure that there is much prospect that he will accept a year's trial as sufficient to establish its merits? The farmers know that it is the merest pretense when it is said that this measure can be repealed at any time if it does not work satisfactorily. Those unable or unwilling to appreciate the farmers' condition at this time will be equally unable next year.

The benefits which it has been stated will accrue to the farmer from this agreement will, on examination, be found to be wholly imaginary. If there is any class or industry which will derive any benefit from it, it certainly is not the agricultural industry. There is absolutely no new market opened for the farmer's products. Canada is an agricultural country, and we are not going to sell her wheat, or oats, or barley, or cattle, or flax, or hay. We are not because of this agreement going to sell her any more cotton or corn than we did, for the simple reason that these products are already on her free list. So far as farm products are concerned, the only increase in our trade with Canada will consist in her exporting a larger amount to us than she has done previously; we shall not only permit her but invite her to invade our markets. The injustice to the farmer involved in this is recognized by the Committee on Ways and Means, when it says in its majority report on the free-list bill.

I want my friends on the other side to pay particular attention to this, because this quotation is your own child.

> In fact, action on the Canadian agreement involves the necessity of further and immediate action in removing a number of duties on imports from other countries, in order that justice may be done to the great army of our agricultural producers, who in the Canadian agreement are to have all the alleged protection removed from their products without a corresponding or reciprocal removal of the protective duties most burdensome on the commodities they must purchase as necessary to sustain their lives and industries. As a beginning in the correction of this injustice, against which our farmers properly protest, the bill (H. R. 4413) herewith reported, has been framed.

That is what the Democrats in the other body said, "to remedy this injustice" done by the Democratic majority, "against which our farmers properly protest."

They acknowledge that the farmer does protest. They seem to have no doubt but that the farmers will suffer from this iniquitous agreement. I would like to know from some Senator on the other side of this Chamber whether they believe that the report made by the majority in the other body is true or not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that the committee of the House reported that this bill was an unmixed injustice? Is it not true that in the rest of the report they set forth the reasons why this bill should be passed? Is it not true that the spirit of their report is that it would be unjust to pass this reciprocity bill and not go further and take duties off other articles? Is not that the fairer statement of the matter?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that the Senator from Missouri is in a better position to know what the distinguished committee meant by making this statement—I have quoted it verbatim; and in replying to the Senator, as to the spirit, I will simply ask, Is it another case where the spirit is willing, but the flesh is undoubtedly weak?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the flesh, if that is the term used to describe the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives, was strong enough to apply the specific remedy referred to in the paragraph of the report the Senator has read. They did pass bills intended to meet the very condition referred to.

Now, I take it the Senator believes this bill is unjust to the farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. I not only believe it, but I know it is.

Mr. REED. Yes; and that it is especially unjust, in his opinion, because the burdens are not taken off of the farmer on the things he purchases.

Mr. GRONNA. Right here—is the Senator from Missouri willing to help me to take this free-list bill and attach it to the reciprocity bill to give the farmers the justice your own committee has said they are entitled to?

Mr. REED. The Senator interrupted my question with one before I was through.

Mr. GRONNA. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. I want to ask him one——

Mr. GRONNA. I thought it was just the proper place to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. REED. Certainly. I was about to ask——

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me, I am willing to vote to attach it to this reciprocity bill. Is the Senator from Missouri willing to help me to take away part of the burden that the American farmer has been subjected to, according to the statement of his party in the other body?

Mr. REED. I am sorry the Senator interrupted my question, because I was traveling to the same point.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the Democratic Members of the Senate, so far as I have heard expression of opinion, without exception, agree to the proposition that they are willing to remove from the farmer every possible burden, and that, so far as I know, they are willing to vote for those very measures which were passed by the House of Representatives to correct the inequalities which were referred to in the paragraph of the report the Senator read. I think there is absolute unanimity of opinion.

Now, I wanted to ask the Senator this question——

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. REED. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Before the Senator asks me a question, will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. REED. But I will ask this one in its order, and then answer with perfect frankness.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. REED. If this bill does pass, will the Senator help the Democrats to relieve the farmer of these inequalities by helping to pass the bills the House of Representatives has already sent in?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Missouri wants me to answer that question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. What assurance can the Senator from Missouri give me that the free-list bill will become a law and relieve the farmer providing the reciprocity bill does pass the Senate?

Mr. REED. I am asking whether, if this does pass, you would go that far with us. Of course, I can not speak for the President. The Senator has already answered the question he has asked me. So far as I know the Democratic opinion is that they would be willing, I think that they would all be willing, to add the House free-list bill and reduction bills to this measure if two things could be assured: One that the bill as thus amended would pass the Senate; and, second, that it would be signed by the President and become a law.

Now, the Senator has already indicated a fear in his own mind that the President would not sign the House bills if they came to him separately.

Mr. GRONNA. I did not intend to indicate any such fear, as will be shown by the statement which I shall make later on. I think it is unfair to the President of the United States to criticize him or to entertain any fear that he will veto any measure until he is given an opportunity to do so. But that is not answering the question which I put to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. The Senator just asked me this question, Whether I could give him the assurance that if these House bills were added to this bill it would become a law? and I took it that he meant that the President's veto might be interposed, because if it passed this House it would only lack that signature in order to become a law.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator——

Mr. REED. It would also lack the concurrence of the House, but the action of the House is assured.

Mr. CLAPP. I wanted to remind the Senator that we have had some experience here in conference matters which would have to be embraced in the suggestion that it would become a law.

Mr. REED. Possibly. Now I will answer the Senator. If the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. GRONNA. I will listen to the Senator——

Mr. REED. If the Senator can give assurance that if this bill is amended by adding the House free list and reduction bills it will be signed by the President of the United States, I am ready to vote for it, provided there are enough votes to assure it would pass here.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. REED. I thought I had.

Mr. GRONNA. The question I am most deeply interested in is the first question I put to the Senator from Missouri.

Will the Senator from Missouri help me to protect the farmers of this country by amending the bill so as to at least give them a very small benefit by attaching the free list to the reciprocity agreement? Will the Senator from Missouri vote with me for such an amendment?

Mr. REED. The very moment the Senator——

Mr. GRONNA. That is the question I should like to have answered.

Mr. REED. The very moment the Senator gives us the assurance that the President will not veto it in that form.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I have not the floor to yield, but I will be glad to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator from North Dakota if he would yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the Senator from Missouri concluded his question?

Mr. REED. I was through. I said I did not have the floor to yield, but I would be glad to yield.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Missouri has any further question to ask I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. REED. Nothing further than to make this statement: I think it is a good time to make it, because we all ought to deal here openly and fairly on this great matter with ourselves and with the country. I think the Democratic position is that the reciprocity bill does not go as far as they would like to have it go. They want other, further, and additional relief for the people of the United States; not the farmers alone, but all classes of citizens. That is the position.

The fear of the Democrats is that if this bill is amended at all here in the Senate it may then be beaten in part by the votes of the very men who helped to amend it; and if it is not beaten, but is passed by the Senate, then it will be vetoed by the President. I think the Democratic position is that the reciprocity bill, while far from perfect, is better than no step in the direction of tariff reduction.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. REED. Just let me conclude what I have been saying, and then I will yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. REED. I take it that the position of our friends represented by the Senator upon his feet is a little similar. He does not so much object to the reciprocity measure if he could carry the reform far enough to equalize the reduction on farm products, but he hesitates to have the reductions go up in separate bills for fear the President will veto them, and he believes that the measure, without the other additional bills or amendments, is a bad bill.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. When I conclude. Now, the trouble with us is not so much where we are trying to go as the assurance that we will get to the destination. And I say again, and I put it to the Senator, can he bring the assurance to the Democrats of this Chamber that if this bill is passed by the Senate and passed by the House with the free-list amendment on, the President of the United States will permit it to become a law?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota, because I should like to answer all these questions at once.

Mr. NELSON. I am surprised at the questions and the disingenuousness of the Senator from Missouri. He knows that this measure passed chiefly by Democratic votes in the other House, and if it has the least show of passage in this House it is because it has the support of the Democratic Party. Most of the Republicans in this Chamber are opposed to that measure. Now, it seems to me, the question whether the bill will be signed by the President if we add the free-list bill ought to be addressed to the President by those who are cooperating with him and who are sailing under his banner. Instead of addressing it to us, who are opposed to reciprocity, address it to the President, under whose flag and banner you are operating.

Mr. REED. Let me ask——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I ought to be permitted to answer one man at a time.

Mr. WARREN. This is along the same lines.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and to whom?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. REED. I ought to be permitted to answer one at a time.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has asked a question, and I am about to ask a question, and you can answer both. I want to ask why the Senator from Missouri has so studiously avoided informing us what the House will do. The newspapers have stated, and it has not been denied, that one of the reasons why they doubt that the President will sign it is because those who originated the measure and caused its passage in the House have refused absolutely to entertain it if we amend it here.

Mr. REED. Have I the permission——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. I want to say that I have neither studiously avoided nor otherwise avoided answering any question. When my good friend gets better acquainted with me he will know that I never do. I have no authority to speak for the House of Representatives; I hold no brief from that great body; but I am here to say that after talking with a number of men who have been very potential in the councils of the Democracy, without exception they have said to me that if the Senate amended this bill by adding the House free-list bills it would never go to conference; that it would be passed by the Democratic votes in the House of Representatives.

Now, I trust the Senator will not say I have avoided anything.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's account from the House does not agree with the purported interviews with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, which formulated these two bills. Perhaps the Senator is right; I do not doubt it; but there seems to be a difference between the testimony of the men in the House who have had most to do with it and the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. It is not the first time I have differed with newspapers; it is not the first time I have been right; and it may not be the first time I have been mistaken. I simply give my statement for what it is worth.

The statement was made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that we were sailing under the President's banner. I do not think the Democratic Party ought to be accused of that. Simply because the President of the United States has gotten partially right on this great question and is taking one step in the right direction, and because we vote for it, we ought not to be required to stand sponsor for him or assume to be his spokesmen. There is no use trying to shift this responsibility, Mr. President. There are men on the other side of the Chamber in the counsels of the President almost daily who represent the administration, practically and in a proper way. I say that without the slightest criticism. They are on the Republican side of this Hall; every one of them is here; and the question ought to be addressed by the Senator from Minnesota and by the Senator from North Dakota to the men who belong to the President's party and who are in the President's counsels. If they can not get information from their own side of the Chamber, just come over to our side and help us a little and we will elect a President who will let us know whether a measure will be signed or not. I say that with respect, for if the President can properly go over this country, making speeches daily upon measures pending before Congress and advise the people, he may just as properly advise this body.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had almost come to the conclusion that the Senator's party had kidnapped our President. I think it is unfair for him to ask me what I believe the President would do or would not do in a matter of this kind.

Mr. REED. With all due respect, when the Democracy start out kidnapping Presidents they will pick one for themselves.

Mr. GRONNA. As a ransom you demand that we surrender to the Canadian farmer the markets which belong to the American farmer, and that is more than the American farmer can stand.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. It is now late. The Senator has been on his feet for more than three hours. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will withdraw that motion, that we may have a brief executive session.

Mr. NELSON. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 7, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the appointment of Mr. GALLINGER to succeed himself as a director on the part of the Senate of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum in the District of Columbia, as provided for in the act of June 10, 1872.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. No. 149, A) memorializing Congress of the United States to take such action as may be necessary to compel all interstate railroads to engage directly in the business of carrying and delivering express.

Whereas the present system of carrying on the express business of this country by companies which enter into private contract with railroads for the transportation of goods is an economic waste, in that such system requires and necessitates to a considerable extent duplicate equipment and investment and earnings necessary to insure a reasonable return on such duplicate investment; and

Whereas it is one of the paramount functions of both Nation and State to enact laws which will compel all business affected with a public interest to be so conducted as to afford to the people the best possible service at the lowest possible rate; and

Whereas to compel railroads to engage in the business of carrying and delivering express will obviate the necessity for duplicate investment and duplicate profit now existing; and

Whereas other countries, with success both economically and financially, have combined the railroad and express business: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States to take such action as may be necessary to compel all interstate railroads to engage directly in the business of carrying and delivering express; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Chief Clerks of the two Houses of Congress and to the United States Senators and Congressmen from Wisconsin.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
H. C. MARTIN,
Acting President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. BURTON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the National Association of Automobile Manufacturers, favoring the adoption of an amendment to the so-called corporation-tax law permitting corporations to make returns at the end of their fiscal years, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of Greenwood Grange, No. 1061, of Hardin County; of Colebrook Grange, No. 1593; of Dunham Grange; of Leipsic Grange, No. 1664; of Warren Grange, No. 1715; of Parma Grange, No. 1732; of Pomona Grange, of Richland County; and of Pleasant Hill Grange, No. 598, of the Patrons of Husbandry, and of sundry citizens, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Pomona Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Ashtabula County, Ohio, praying for the establishment of a parcels-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a petition of the congregation of the Christian Church of Hyde County, N. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors into prohibition districts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of sundry farmers of Santa Paula, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the inspection of foreign nursery stock, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BRADLEY presented a memorial of the Trade and Labor Assemblies of Kenton and Campbell Counties, in the State of Kentucky, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 31) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Astoria Centennial, to be held at Astoria, Oreg., August 10 to September 9, 1911, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 98) thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 955) to provide for the extension of the post-office and courthouse building at Dallas, Tex., and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 97) thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLESTON, W. VA.

Mr. WATSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2932) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the old post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., and in the event of such sale to enter into a contract for the construction of a suitable post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., without additional cost to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLIANCE, OHIO.

Mr. REED. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2208) appropriating additional funds for the erection of a public building at the city of Alliance, in the State of Ohio, and I submit a report (No. 96) thereon.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2956) to define the true intent and meaning of section 48 of the act of August 28, 1894, levying taxes on distilled spirits, to regulate the business of reclaiming waste spirits from empty whisky barrels, and to define the status of persons engaged in such business; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BRIGGS:

A bill (S. 2957) for the relief of Jane Brand Barnard; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 2958) for the relief of Benjamin F. Lancaster (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2959) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Chapel Hill, N. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 2960) for the relief of Cleveland L. Short (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2961) for the relief of H. D. Norcom, administrator de bonis non of E. H. Norcom, deceased (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 2962) for the relief of Thomas M. Brower and John M. Brower, heirs of Jacob W. Brower, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CRANE:

A bill (S. 2963) granting an increase of pension to John A. White; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 2964) for the reinstatement of Lieut. Col. Constantine Marrast Perkins to the active list of the Marine Corps; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 2965) granting an increase of pension to Joshua Boring (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

CORPORATIONS IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CLAPP submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 98), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest date practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the laws of the United States relating to the creation and control of corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and what changes are necessary or desirable in the laws of the United States relating to persons or firms engaged in interstate commerce; and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress at such times and places as they may deem desirable or practicable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to conduct hearings and have reports of same printed for use, and to employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary; and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

REPUBLICAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a copy of the address delivered by President Taft at a banquet of the Marion Club, Indianapolis, Ind., July 4, 1911, on the subject of Republican reciprocity. I move that the address be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 63.)

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. On the 5th of July the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] caused to be printed in the RECORD a communication from a citizen of Georgia in regard to the proposed amendment of the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by the people. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD four editorials, short ones, from Georgia papers showing an entirely different opinion in regard to the amendment, and also one from the New York Press of the same tenor, denoting that the question is not at all sectional.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[The Atlanta Georgian (and News).]

SENATOR BRISTOW SETS A STUMBLING BLOCK.

The House resolution providing for the direct election of Senators was proceeding merrily on its way to success when Senator BRISTOW set a stumbling block for it.

Senator SUTHERLAND, at the last session of Congress, had successfully played the same little trick, and Senator BRISTOW deemed it timely that he do likewise and gain like renown.

Accordingly, he offered an amendment providing that the United States Government should retain the control of the time, place, and manner of holding the election, the meaning of which is that the Government will have the power of prescribing such suffrage requirements for the elections as it deems fit.

The Federal Government would thus be able when it so chose to nullify the suffrage laws of the Southern States—laws which these States have enacted from causes arising out of the truest meaning of the words self-defense and self-protection.

It should be stated, however, that Congress already has this power over the election of Representatives, but has never used it since the days of the military rule in the Southern States following the close of the Civil War. The force bill was an attempt to put it in operation, but it never succeeded even then, and will never likely succeed at any time.

The Nation has passed a century and a quarter of its existence with the States in complete control of the elections, both of their Senators and Representatives. The House resolution, without the Bristow amendment, is merely writing this long practice in the Constitution. It can certainly, therefore, do the Nation no harm.

The Southern States are asked to give their approval of the direct election of Senators. This they do gladly and freely, but it is too much to ask of them that at the same time they approve it in such a form as to relinquish a safeguard of their prized, because long-fought-for, suffrage laws.

The Federal Government will never likely disturb these laws, but the South wants to make sure and wants this surety incorporated in the fundamental law of the land. This is the price that it sets on its approval of the direct elections bill.

Accordingly, the House has refused to concur in the Bristow amendment, and it has been sent back for the Senate to ruminate over.

The Bristow amendment has already proved a stumbling block in the way of the resolution's final passage by Congress. It will prove an even greater stumbling block in the way of the amendment's ratification by the necessary number of States. The legislatures of the Southern States would never give it their approval.

THE DIRECT ELECTION BILL.

The refusal of the House to concur in the Bristow amendment, with which the Senate sought to check the force of the bill for the direct election of Senators, naturally meets with the applause and approval of those who advocate State rights. The purpose of the amendment was solely to put into the hands of Congress the power to interfere with the action of the States by giving to it the power to regulate the time and manner of holding the elections for United States Senators.

It was, in fact, a direct threat to the Southern States from the Republican Party to interfere with their election arrangements, whereby the white people maintain control of their States and uphold their standards of civilization and government. While the Republican States would have little annoyance to fear should events so turn about as to put the Democratic Party in control of Congress, the Southern States would be open to difficulties and indignities from a Republican Congress which it would scarcely be possible for us to measure. Moreover, by the power of this mischievous amendment the popular election of Senators would be but a tragic farce and the interests behind the Republican Party would be presented with a "good road to progress" into the subjugation of the States.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri was taunted by a Republican Representative, who said: "You are afraid that your grandfather clause will be declared unconstitutional."

It may be as well frankly to acknowledge that this issue is to be avoided if possible. Self-preservation, which is the first law of nature, and the most dominant of all laws, has obliged the Southern States, by every possible measure to circumnavigate one of the constitutional amendments which was tacked on to the Constitution fabric at a time when the voice of the South was forcibly silenced. In almost every State in the South there could be found provisions which, under a strict construction of the Federal law, from an inimical point of view, might be declared unconstitutional.

But it is no longer the purpose of the Republicans to disrupt the country and bring on the trouble this sort of action would be obliged to precipitate. It is merely their object to hold this threat over the Southern States as a club and with it to clear the path for the further subjugation of the States to the power of the special interests of which the whole Republican Party has become merely an instrument.

Representative RUCKER, in his objections to the Bristow amendment, said: "I have no fear of the people, but of the combinations behind closed doors which trample on the most sacred rights of the people. Give the States just a little more power and we will take the Lumber Trusts, the Sugar and all the other trusts out of politics."

This sums it up about as well as it could possibly be told, and whether or not the Senate will consent to giving the States a chance to remove the trusts from politics remains to be seen.

THE SENATE'S ACTION.

The Senate of the United States has passed by the impressive vote of 64 to 24 the resolution proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote and declaring—through the Bristow amendment—that the Federal Government shall have power over the manner, time, and place of holding elections for United States Senators. On the latter proposition the Senate was very evenly divided, the vote being 44 to 44, Vice President SHERMAN casting the single ballot that fastened this amendment on the resolution.

The vote for the resolution in spite of the undesirable amendment shows that popular sentiment in favor of the change is, or is believed to be, overwhelming. If the House acts favorably on the resolution in its amended form it will go to the States for ratification, and its final adoption as an amendment to the Constitution will probably depend on the action of the Southern legislatures. These, it has been predicted, will never ratify it with the Bristow provision included.

We note with satisfaction that Senators BACON and TERRELL, of Georgia, were among the 24 who voted against the resolution on its final passage with the Bristow amendment attached.

[Macon News, June 17, 1911.]

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BRISTOW AMENDMENT.

If this amendment should be accepted by the House and finally ratified by the States it would have to be construed in connection with section 4, Article I, which vests in the Congress the heretofore dormant power of making and altering the regulations for the election of Representatives at will, which would then also apply to the election of Senators.

The mere fact that the Congress would have the power to tamper with the election of Senators under the new amendment, should it be finally adopted, does not infallibly imply that it would exercise the power to do so, but it would leave a very uncomfortable feeling in the minds of all patriotic and thoughtful people to know that the power had been implanted in the Constitution, and the activity and determination displayed by the Roots, the Smoots, the Gallingers, the Guggenheims, and others of that sort to bring about this end means that they will make mischief of it in future if they can do so.

We believe it safest, therefore, by all odds for southern Senators and Representatives to have none of it; for the Democratic House to refuse to concur with the Bristow amendment; and, failing that, for the Southern States to refuse to ratify the amendment.

"So far as the letter of the Constitution is concerned," says the New York World, "the powers of Congress might not be increased by the ratification of the amendment in the form drafted by Senator BRISTOW; yet the feeling is general throughout the South that such an amendment would be perverted into a referendum in favor of Federal control of the franchise and would revive the latent powers that have never been exercised. It is easy enough to say that these fears are exaggerated, but they have to be dealt with, and it is doubtful if a single southern legislature would ratify the senatorial amendment in the form in which it is presented by the Senate. Without assistance from the South the Constitution can not be changed, and there can be no popular election of Senators.

"The Bristow amendment is unnecessary and mischievous. The powers that it emphasizes are fully reserved to Congress in other sections of the Constitution. It merely arouses sectional animosities and imperils the movement for the election of Senators by direct vote."

[New York Press.]

BAD FAITH IN THE SENATE.

In appointing Senators CLARK of Wyoming, BACON of Georgia, and NELSON of Minnesota as conferees on behalf of the Senate over the Bristow amendment to the direct-elections resolution, the upper House of Congress shows little sign of yielding to the House. A majority of the Senate, as the roll call on the Bristow rider showed, is willing to run the risk of refusal by the States to ratify the direct election of United States Senators. For there is a great risk of rejection of the amendment if the measure is coupled with a threat to enforce the constitutional rights of the colored citizen in the suffrage. Those who voted for the Bristow amendment are therefore either hostile to direct choice of Senators or lukewarm toward that plan when they insist on a clause attached to it which makes the reform odious to the Southern States.

No Senator can be considered a real friend of the principle of popularly elected Senators if he persists in voting for the Bristow amendment. No Senator so voting can escape the suspicion that he is more interested in the promotion of Lorimerism than in extending to the southern negroes the privilege of voting. No Senator believes that the restoration of the electoral franchise to the southern negro can be brought about as an incident to the enfranchisement of both white and black voters, both at the North and the South, who are now robbed in so many cases of the right to choose United States Senators.

The Bristow amendment is insincere. It is an obstacle in the way of a really feasible reform; and if that was not the purpose of its author, the character of a great deal of its support in the Senate is such as to show that it is being used in bad faith. The Senate ought to recede from its amendment and submit the resolution to the States in the form adopted by the House. Then, standing by itself, the principle of popular election of United States Senators will be ratified by a unanimous vote.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clapp	Jones	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Crane	Lippitt	Smoot
Bourne	Culberson	McCumber	Stone
Bradley	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Sutherland
Brandegee	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Swanson
Briggs	Curtis	Nelson	Taylor
Bristow	Fletcher	Page	Thornton
Brown	Foster	Penrose	Warren
Bryan	Gronna	Perkins	Watson
Burnham	Guggenheim	Poindexter	Wetmore
Burton	Heyburn	Pomerene	Williams
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Reed	Works
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Simmons

Mr. BURNHAM. My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. WARREN addressed the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to move to take up an appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know the Senator wanted to bring up the bill at this time. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] gave notice of his intention to conclude his remarks this morning on the pending reciprocity bill.

Mr. WARREN. I assume it will be agreeable to the Senator from North Dakota to allow this small appropriation bill to be disposed of.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. Then I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 12109.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, after line 6, to insert:

SENATE.

For compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the employ of the Senate, namely: Sixteen pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each, during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, $3,680, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 3, to insert:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation for inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, is herewith made available for use during the fiscal year 1912.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 11, to insert:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 13, to insert:

For additional amount for the assistant clerk to the Committee on Immigration for services from May 1, 1911, to June 30, 1912, both inclusive, $420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 17, to insert:

To pay N. G. Morgan for extra services in compiling and supervising the publication of eulogies on deceased Members of Congress and statuary proceedings for the Sixty-first Congress, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 22, to insert:

The Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund the compensation usually allowed for compiling and editing the edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, as prepared and published under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 17, to insert:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

For attorney for the Government Printing Office, to be appointed by the Joint Committee on Printing, for the fiscal year 1912, $3,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, is it not an unusual proceeding to authorize a committee to appoint an officer of the Government? It seems to me that that officer should be appointed as other Assistant Attorneys General are appointed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in this case an attorney is necessary, and the amendment merely provides for an attorney who was formerly engaged in this work.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think there is no other instance in the Government in which any employee of this character is appointed other than by the usual method of appointment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I had better explain to the Senator and to the Senate what the object of the provision is. The Printing Office has had an attorney for years. Mr. Elder has been that attorney ever since I have been chairman of the Printing Committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. By whom was he appointed?

Mr. SMOOT. He has been in the past appointed by the Public Printer, but during the last session of Congress it was suggested that he be appointed by the Attorney General, as all other attorneys for the departments, with the exception, I believe, of the Agricultural Department, are appointed. The Attorney General so recommended, and in an appropriation bill the Senate at the last session inserted a provision authorizing the attorney for the Printing Office to be assigned or appointed by the Attorney General.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the usual method.

Mr. SMOOT. But that provision went out in conference. The Senator will remember that in the last minutes of the last session the bill was in conference, and nearly all of the Senate amendments were disagreed to. That left the Printing Office without an attorney.

The Attorney General has no power under the law to assign an attorney to the Printing Office, and this provision is designed to provide for an attorney for the Printing Office for this session of Congress. So far as I am concerned, I shall, when the next appropriation bill comes before the Senate, ask that the attorney for the Printing Office be assigned by the Attorney General, as most other attorneys for the departments are assigned; but if this provision is not passed at this session the Printing Office will be without an attorney, and there are contracts——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not proposing to defeat the amendment. My attention was naturally attracted to it because it involves an unusual proceeding, and it is just as well for us to understand the matter as we go along.

The Printing Office occupies a position occupied by no other branch of the Government. It is the Congressional Printing Office, and originally it was for the use of Congress only. Now it has been absorbed by the executive departments of the Government, and they seem to think that it is really their instrumentality, when, as a matter of fact, it is the instrumentality of Congress alone; but through a general acceptance of the conditions it is now the printing office for the administrative branch of the Government as well as of Congress, and they make use of it more than we do.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will say that the duty of the Committee on Appropriations in this matter is, of course, to provide for emergency appropriations. This seems to be the proper way to provide for what was considered by the Printing Committee an emergency——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not criticizing the committee.

Mr. WARREN. To provide an agency through which the work could be done for the present and until such time as legislation might provide for it in the manner that the Senator from Idaho suggests.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not criticizing the committee. This is an innovation in legislation, and it is well enough for Senators to understand why the innovation is proposed. I have had occasion to consider this question before. The relation which the Public Printing Office bears to the Government is dissimilar from the relation which any other branch of the Government bears to the General Government. If we are going to have an attorney—and I assume that one is necessary, though I do not know just why, but I assume that it is necessary to have an attorney for the Printing Office, and I am not going to controvert that—I am only calling attention to the manner of the appointment. If committees of this body are to appoint attorneys for administrative branches of the Government, that is something entirely new. Admitting that an attorney is necessary, do we want to be originators or pioneers in an innovation that may possibly come home to us when some other department of the Government is seeking to encroach upon the rights and duties of our branch of the Government? That is the question.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to get in too big a hurry this morning to pass this bill. We have nothing of much importance awaiting us and we have plenty of time; the weather is good, and I do not think that anything is gained by too much haste in this matter.

I do not desire to see a change in this respect. I do not desire to see a system inaugurated or recognized by which committees of Congress, whether joint or separate, shall have power to appoint attorneys. The other day when we were considering a certain investigation and a committee was appointed, we authorized that committee to employ attorneys. I felt at that time that that was the limit beyond which we certainly never should go, but this is a step beyond that.

I merely call attention to this in order that we may not get up such speed in enacting this measure as to overlook the fact that we are entering upon a new plan of legislation and procedure. That is all. I think that the amendment proposed by the committee should have provided for this attorney either to be nominated by the President or assigned by the Attorney General, which would seem to be entirely appropriate, inasmuch as the Printing Office is now quasi administrative and is no longer strictly the instrumentality of Congress. I think the Attorney General should assign one of the very many assistants now at his disposal for the performance of those duties, and thus avoid entering upon this innovation.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Committee on Appropriations, I presume it will not be improper for me to say that I opposed the insertion of anything on this subject in the bill on the ground that it was additional and general legislation, which ought not to be incorporated in an urgent deficiency bill. I do not make the point of order, and shall not make it, but I want to state that it is contrary to the rules of the Senate and the practice of the Senate by an amendment in an urgent deficiency bill to provide for general legislation and the creation of an additional office. I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment, though I do not, as I said awhile ago, make the point of order against it. But, Mr. President, this amendment is not, as I remember, the amendment which was adopted by the committee. That amendment, according to my recollection, provided that this appointment should be made by the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is mistaken about that. The proposition before us was that this attorney should be appointed by the Attorney General, and the criticism was made, and I think properly so, that that carried it into the realm of general legislation. The committee did not feel that it ought to insert general legislation in an emergency bill.

The reason the provision was framed in this manner was that it was to be treated as an emergency, it being necessary to provide for an attorney in the interim during this year until the matter could be taken up in the regular way in some general bill or in one of the annual appropriation bills.

Mr. CULBERSON. I accept, Mr. President, the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who was present all the time during the consideration of the bill, as to what actually occurred. My recollection was to the contrary, however.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that if we are to have an attorney for the Government Printing Office he ought to be appointed in the regular way by the Attorney General of the United States and not by a joint committee of Congress. The duties of this joint committee are legislative and not executive, and they ought not to have the appointment of this officer. I therefore move an amendment to strike out the words "Joint Committee on Printing" and to insert the words "Attorney General."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 20, in the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, after the words "by the," it is proposed to strike out "Joint Committee on Printing" and to insert "Attorney General," so as to read:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

For attorney for the Government Printing Office, to be appointed by the Attorney General, for the fiscal year 1912, $3,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 4, after line 5, to insert:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The amount authorized to be expended for the completion of the chapel building at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., by the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, is hereby made available for the payment of any existing indebtedness on said building not in excess of $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 13, to insert:

To complete construction under the authorization heretofore made, on the military reservation at Fort Mason, Cal., of a general supply depot for the supply departments of the United States Army, including the necessary storehouses, offices, shops, stables, sheds, power houses, quarters, and other buildings, together with wharves for the accommodation of at least four ships of the Army transport service, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 21, to insert:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The portion of the act approved March 4, 1911, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes," which reads as follows: "Clerks to paymasters and not exceeding 10 clerks to accounting officers at yards and stations, general storekeepers ashore and afloat not exceeding 10 clerks, and receiving ships, and other vessels; 2 clerks to general inspectors of Pay Corps; 1 clerk to pay officer in charge of deserters' rolls;" is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Clerks to paymasters at yards and stations, general storekeepers ashore, and receiving ships, and other vessels; 2 clerks to general inspectors of the Pay Corps; 1 clerk to pay officer in charge of deserters' rolls; not exceeding 10 clerks to accounting officers at yards and stations; and not exceeding 10 clerks to general storekeepers afloat."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 14, to insert:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

For work at Capitol and for general repairs thereof, including flags for the east and west fronts of the center of the Capitol and for Senate and House Office Buildings; flagstaffs, halyards, and tackle; wages of mechanics and laborers; purchase, maintenance, and driving of office vehicle; and not exceeding $100 for the purchase of technical and necessary reference books and city directory, $1,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 23, to insert:

For the care and improvement of the grounds surrounding the Capitol, Senate and House Office Buildings; pay of one clerk, mechanics, gardeners; for fertilizers; repairs to pavements, walks, and roadways; to continue available during the fiscal year 1912, $7,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with respect to the provision for an additional clerk. For whom is this clerk to work?

Mr. WARREN. To what does the Senator from Iowa refer?

Mr. CUMMINS. I refer to that part of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations which reads:

For the care and improvement of the grounds surrounding the Capitol, Senate and House Office Buildings; pay of one clerk, mechanics, gardeners, etc.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the provision the Senator quotes is merely the language of the original appropriation act which we followed and does not add to the amount heretofore appropriated for a clerk. We do not authorize an additional clerk, but merely enlarge the scope of the general appropriation. We use the language in which the original appropriation was made which carried these employees.

Mr. CUMMINS. The original appropriation is sufficient to pay those who are now employed?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, then, does the amendment provide for "pay of one clerk, mechanics, gardeners," and so forth?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will notice, there are several other things provided for.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but why do you put in a clerk?

Mr. WARREN. As I said before, that language is used to designate what we are providing for, so that the appropriation may be used for any emergency that may occur as to any of those items mentioned in the regular annual appropriation. The recital of clerk, and so forth, is in the nature of a title.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume this amount is to be expended by the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has not asked for any additional clerks, has he, and is it not proposed that there be an additional clerk employed?

Mr. WARREN. It is not. This provision is to carry on the work of grading, making a lawn, erecting a fountain, and providing for other work that is unfinished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am entirely satisfied——

Mr. WARREN. And the only reason that the words occur to which the Senator refers is simply that it seemed proper to give a recitation of the original language used in making the appropriation granting him the authority, et cetera.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am entirely satisfied with the assurance of the chairman of the committee that there will be no additional clerical force employed, because I have not understood an additional force was necessary.

But now I ask the Senator whether there is an appropriation which will enable the superintendent to finish the interior court or park in the Senate Office Building. It is a most unsightly place, and I should like to know why it is not finished.

Mr. WARREN. There has not heretofore been any appropriation for that purpose, and this bill carries the necessary appropriation to finish that work.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think that $7,000 is sufficient to finish the building?

Mr. WARREN. The bids are filed providing for a fountain similar to the one erected on the House side, which cost something like $2,500. They have bids for grading and grassing the lawn for about $4,500, and the amounts for both are inserted here.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the appropriation enable the superintendent to construct the steps and ways around the court?

Mr. WARREN. That relates entirely to another matter. There is at present an appropriation available at any moment to finish the steps and, as I understand, all unfinished portions of the building proper. But there are certain repairs throughout this Capitol Building which we provide for here in the matter of $1,700, and $7,000 appropriated to take care of these grounds, which never have been provided for.

Mr. CUMMINS. After these appropriations are made the superintendent can go forward then with all practicable speed and finish the interior of the building and make it decent and sightly?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator, in further explanation of the reason it has not been done before, that the finishing of the basement and some of the interior of the building has caused the officials to use this ground for the storage of lumber and sand and material, and it was thought best to wait until the interior was finished before undertaking to finish the lawn or before putting in the steps at entrances where they would have to drag in and out certain material.

Mr. CUMMINS. The condition the Senator mentions has not existed for the last four months.

Mr. WARREN. That is true, but there has been no appropriation in the meantime.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 4, to insert:

Department of Justice:

For special emergency repairs to the Court of Claims Building, $281.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to offer an amendment on page 4, after line 5. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I retain the floor.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION COMMISSION.

That a commission is hereby constituted to consist of three commissioners, to be known and designated as the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Commission, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, and who shall be subject to removal by him. Vacancies in said commission to be filled by appointment by the President.

Said commissioners at their first meeting shall organize by the election of their officers, including the election of a secretary.

The allotment of space for exhibitors, the classification of exhibits, the appointment of all powers of award, and the awarding of premiums shall be done and performed by said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co., subject, however, to the approval of said commission.

That after the plans of said commission shall be prepared by said company, the rules and regulations of said company affecting the rights or privileges or interests of exhibitors or of the public shall be fixed and established by said company, subject, however, to the approval of said commissioners.

That the commissioners appointed by the President under the authority of this act shall receive the sum of $7,500 each per annum, together with their actual and necessary expenses, including traveling expenses, and the secretary to said commission shall receive the sum of $3,000 per annum, all of said salaries to be paid by the Treasurer of the United States out of moneys not otherwise appropriated. That there is hereby appropriated a further sum of $5,000 per annum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of additional clerical force and other necessary expenses of said commission, said sum to be paid out only on the certificate of the chairman of said commission.

That the United States shall not in any manner, under any circumstances, be liable for any acts or doings of said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co., or under the laws of the State of California, or by their officers, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for services, wages, labor, or salaries of officers or agents, or servants of employees, or for supplies, material, or any other things in and about the construction, operation, or maintenance of said exposition, or for any subscription to capital stock or any stock certificates, bonds, or mortgages of any kind issued by said corporation or by said commission, or for any debts, liabilities, or expenses of any kind or nature whatsoever attending such exposition or corporation, or accruing from the same, or for any expense or cost connected with said commission, except as provided for and authorized herein.

That nothing in this act shall be construed as binding the United States Government, either directly or indirectly, to extend any pecuniary aid or assistance, either as a loan, donation, or otherwise, to the said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. either before or after the termination of said exposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not yield for a point of order. I have the floor, and I will not yield for a point of order until I have said what I have to say.

Mr. WARREN. I am not asking the Senator to yield for a point of order. If he declines to yield, I can make the point of order later, if I wish to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely wanted to say to the Senator——

Mr. WARREN. I rose to offer my kindly services to the Senator; but as he has the floor, let him go on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will be glad to accept it, if the Senator will state it.

I wanted, in connection with offering this amendment, that it should appear in the RECORD that public resolution No. 56 of the Sixty-first Congress, House joint resolution No. 213, authorized the President to invite the world to participate in this exposition, but it makes no provision whatever for the manner in which the Government of the United States shall carry out or receive the acceptance of foreign nations, and it makes no provision whatever for any control of space in the exposition on behalf of the United States, and it makes no provision whatever for the appointment of anyone who shall represent the United States in the carrying out of this resolution of the last session.

If there is any case in which there is an urgent deficiency involved, it is in this matter of the Panama Exposition. As it is now there is an absolute deficiency in legislation, and there is an absolute deficiency in financial provision for the carrying out of the resolution.

Why enact this resolution if we are not going to make any provision under which the United States Government can do what it authorizes the President to inaugurate or institute?

Now, it has been suggested that these expenses should be borne by the corporation in California. I have never been in favor of allowing any private individual or corporation or organization to pay for anything that the Government of the United States authorized to be done. In the first place, the proper paymaster is the master in these cases and not some one else who may because of fancied advantage volunteer to relieve the United States of the burden of paying its own officers. The principle is bad.

Mr. President, I want to anticipate any objection that may be raised by a point of order in this case, and it was with no discourtesy to the Senator from Wyoming at all that I objected to being interrupted. But of course we have all observed that sometimes one meets with an unexpected condition when you yield the floor, and I want to expressly disclaim any intention to be discourteous. I wanted to state plainly why I did not yield, because under ordinary circumstances I would yield to the Senator from Wyoming or to any Senator who indicated a desire to say anything.

I want to make this perfectly plain, so that it will not appear to be in violation of the rule of legislation that does and should govern in these matters. An urgent deficiency is not necessarily confined to the provision for financial assistance or financial relief, because in several parts of this bill as reported from the committee it recommends measures that are as far from that rule as this would be.

I think it is a proper subject for an urgent deficiency bill to provide for the carrying out of the express will of Congress or to make provisions to enable any of the executive or administrative branches of the Government to carry them out.

Mr. PERKINS. As far as concerns the suggestion of the Senator, it has been expected that the President would at the proper time send in a communication or recommendation relating to this commission. Therefore, I suggest to my friend the Senator from Idaho whether it is not better for us to defer action until we receive such a message from the President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not feel at liberty to make a statement here without special authorization in regard to that matter, but I will say to the Senator from California that I am sufficiently advised to justify me in saying that it would not be against the wishes or any policy of the President to have this action taken.

I did not think to make any further preparation in regard to the matter. There is no question at all but that the Government should be represented in determining the apportionment of space to different Governments and the general arrangement of this exposition. Otherwise, as it is a private corporation, it may do as it sees fit, and the Government would have no control, and yet it will be heralded to the world that it is a national affair, and the President will have invited the nations of the world to participate in it under the assumption that our Government, acting through Congress, will make a provision adequate for it.

Now, we have always made provision for the appointment and the compensation of commissioners. In this case I have taken the liberty of cutting down the number of commissioners from five to three, as proposed elsewhere, and of reducing the proposed salary of the secretary. I do not believe in a wide-open door of expenditure in a matter of this kind. I think it is our duty to act at this time in view of the fact that before Congress meets again in all human probability and in all propriety these invitations will have been issued to the world to participate in this exposition, and the inquiry will very naturally arise, "Well, where is the United States to be found; with whom are we to deal; where are the commissioners or representatives of the United States?" One method proposed would lead to the answer, "The exposition corporation, incorporated under the laws of the State of California, is to pay these commissioners." If that corporation is to pay them, then the commissioners would be the employees of that corporation. Congress would have no control over them.

I am very anxious that such a condition should not arise. I am very anxious that whoever stands as the representative of the United States shall be subject to the control of the United States and paid by the United States. It is for that reason that I have taken occasion to occupy the time of the Senate in explaining the matter. It would be intolerable to think that a private corporation might have control of the commissioners representing the Government of the United States on an occasion of that kind.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that this amendment will be adopted. It is an urgent deficiency, in that there is an utter lack of provision for the carrying out of an existing law.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I think something ought to be done along the line suggested by the Senator from Idaho, but I wondered, on hearing the amendment read, how this commission is to exist.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would exist until the end of the exposition, but the commissioners are subject to removal by the President.

Mr. JONES. I wondered whether the Senator thought of that, and whether it would not be a good idea to limit his amendment——

Mr. HEYBURN. It is limited. There is a provision that the power to appoint shall exist only during the period occupied by the exposition. I have it not at my desk, or I would refer to it.

Mr. JONES. I think something ought to be done along the line of the amendment, but I think there ought to be some limitation so that the term of these commissioners will be pretty definitely fixed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course it should be definitely fixed. Now, I will see.

I will say that I dictated this amendment, and it only came to me at my desk. I have not had the time I would ordinarily like in looking it over, but I intended to incorporate a provision that the commission should expire with the closing of the exposition, and if it is not so expressly stated there, I would be very glad to thus modify it.

Mr. JONES. I did not notice anything of that kind as it was read, and I thought there ought to be something of that sort in it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I crossed out nearly a page of it here at the desk, and I was just looking to see if I had crossed that out. The power of the President to vacate the appointment at any time, of course, would terminate the commission. That power is expressly given.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me, however, we ought to require a report of the commission by a certain time and close up its work.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in thorough accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Washington in that regard. I will amend the proposed amendment by inserting appropriate words.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am in entire harmony with the purpose expressed by the Senator from Idaho. Clearly if the President is to exercise the power conferred upon him by the Congress and to invite the representatives of foreign powers to attend the exposition there ought to be some official representative of the Government of the United States who will see to it that we are not humiliated by having given an invitation and then failed to be courteous to the guests who come in response to it. That representation ought to be official, authoritative, with adequate powers prescribed, and properly limited.

I should hesitate, however, to assent to the disposition of the matter in quite such a summary way as by an amendment offered on the floor to an urgent deficiency bill. I feel a little responsibility on such subjects because I happen to be chairman of the Committee on Industrial Expositions. I had hoped that at the proper time and in the proper way I would be able, through the instrumentality of that committee, to reduce this subject to a little more of system. The difficulty which the Senator from Idaho has perceived here, and which he has presented so aptly and forcibly, is continually arising. We treat the subjects of expositions, the acceptance of invitations to us by foreign governments, and the extending of invitations to them, in each instance as if it were a sporadic case, as if it stood by itself.

In fact, when we take them altogether, they are continuous. They are coming one after another. They are a part of the great activity of international intercourse throughout the world. I think we are about the only country that does not treat them in any systematic way.

I say I hope this subject may be put in the way of thorough consideration and the framing of a provision so that the powers of the representatives of the United States may be fitted to the powers of the company or whatever concern it is that is giving the exposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may interrupt the Senator, we have never faced just the condition that confronts us now. We are dealing with a private corporation, and that is unusual.

Mr. ROOT. We have done that often. We did it at St. Louis, and we did it at Jamestown.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was a legislative corporation.

Mr. ROOT. They were private corporations.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was a legislative corporation, provided for by the legislature, with their rights and powers limited.

Mr. ROOT. I can not say as to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not undertake to speak accurately about it.

Mr. ROOT. I have not examined the subject with reference to making a definite statement, but my recollection is that there was an exposition corporation at St. Louis and an exposition corporation at Jamestown. I do not hesitate to say, sir, that the arrangements for the representation of the United States were not adequate in either of those cases, and they did not work out the results which ought to have been produced.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to say to the Senator——

Mr. ROOT. I hope we will make thorough work in dealing with this subject. I am very glad the Senator from Idaho has brought it up.

Mr. HEYBURN. I feel that I owe an apology to the standing committee in this matter. The necessity arose suddenly, and I could not ascertain that any other Senator intended to bring it up. Of course, after the adjournment of this special session, which may be in the very near future, there will be no opportunity to deal with this question until the regular meeting of Congress.

Upon the proposal to a foreign nation to participate in the exposition, the first question will be how much space can they have. There is no authority existing to-day that can control that matter or that should control it. This provision which authorizes the commission to participate in and to absolutely control the assignment of space to foreign countries is a very important one, and it is imminent. It is an urgent deficiency all right, because there must be some power.

Had there been time, I would not have assumed to take this up as an individual Senator, but it came to me last evening after the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had reported out the bill. Ordinarily we would not have expected it to be reported so quickly. It came in a few days before and was reported out without any opportunity to consider the method or the propriety of this measure. Unless we do it now in this way, I think the Senator from New York will agree with me that we will not be able to make any provision at all for many months.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. My idea had been that the formulation of the powers of the representatives of the Government in the exposition which is now under consideration would come better at a later time than now. I should like to know a little more what is to be the scope of the undertaking. I do not think they have yet settled on their site.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that in the dictation of this morning I had anticipated that question, but I concluded, just as the Senator has concluded, after seeing it before me on my desk, coming after the Senate sat, that we were not yet ready to deal with those details; and I thought if we provided for a commission that should stay the hand of anticipation in regard to the assignment of space and the other very important matter provided for here the regular committee would take it up and formulate what would, in effect, be a code for the direction and control of the commission. I had no intention of attempting at this time to fully anticipate the necessities of legislation, but merely to take advantage of the only possible opportunity of getting any legislation on the subject at all.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Idaho whether it would not be a good plan for the Senator to withdraw his amendment and offer it as a bill, so that it might be considered by the committee, and then, perhaps, when another deficiency appropriation bill comes later before the Senate it can be attached to that measure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would unhesitatingly accept that suggestion if there was any possibility of getting a bill enacted into a law. Without referring particularly to the conditions elsewhere, we know that no such bill would become a law for probably eight or nine months.

Mr. CURTIS. I made the suggestion because of the fact that I had intended to offer an amendment to this bill on another subject, but I was advised that there would likely be another deficiency bill at this session, and I agreed to wait.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I thought there would be another deficiency bill that would be enacted into law, I would be very much relieved to be rid of this question this morning. If I have done nothing more than to halt the rush of legislation this morning, I will feel that I have not occupied the time of the Senate in vain.

Mr. ROOT. Why not put it on the reciprocity bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, there comes a suggestion which is worthy of serious consideration. Doubtless it might be considered as an appropriate amendment on the reciprocity bill or as an amendment to some of the amendments to be proposed to that bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am afraid it may be inferred by some of the things that have been said by the Senator from Idaho that the Senators from California have been neglectful of their obligation to their own people. It had not occurred to me that it was necessary to take any action at this time. It does not seem to me that there is any haste about it or any emergency to call for action at present.

I am not at all antagonistic to what is being done by the Senator from Idaho, but I wanted to assure the Senate that so far as my colleague and myself are concerned, we are very anxious to do anything we can to make the San Francisco exposition a success. I understand, however, that the conditions there are in a rather formative state at present, and there is no particular reason why action of this kind should be taken just now.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho that a commission of this kind should be formed for the purpose of protecting the Government in the holding of the exposition. I do not know whether the commission ought to be composed of five members, as has been the custom heretofore I believe, or whether it should be limited to three in number. But I only wanted to protect myself and my colleague from the inference which might be drawn that we were not properly looking after the interests of our constituents.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would deem myself very unfortunate if I had offered grounds for such an inference. Of course I did not. This is a matter in which all the States are equally interested, and being a resident of one of the neighboring States, a resident of a State that will take great pride in participating on a very liberal scale in the exposition, I do not feel that I have encroached upon any prerogative of the Senators from California.

Mr. WORKS. I will state that the matter is not confined to California by any means. I understand that the people of the whole country are interested in the exposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are equally interested in it. Whether they benefit equally or not, they are equally interested in it.

I think, with these suggestions, I will only urge that this is the only opportunity, and it is quite worth while to hesitate long enough to see that the opportunity does not pass from us without leaving another in its place and to be without commissioners, say, until the appropriation bill comes in next year. About February will come the only appropriation bill on which this provision could be incorporated, and probably later than that. So it is quite important that we take the question of time into consideration. The invitations will doubtless be sent out by the President at a very early period.

Mr. ROOT. I will make it my business to ascertain what the purpose is in regard to sending invitations. I had not supposed that the sending of them was imminent. I had not supposed that the President would consider it his duty to issue the invitations before arrangements had been made to make it certain that the nations responding to the invitations would be adequately cared for.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the business of the commission to adequately care for them.

Mr. ROOT. Certainly; and in order that they may perform that duty they must have powers conferred upon them, and in order that those powers may not be unduly exercised the powers must be prescribed and limited.

Mr. HEYBURN. Undoubtedly. It is a large question.

Mr. ROOT. It is a subject that needs study. It needs careful study, in view of some comparative failures in the past owing to a lack of system.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all true, Mr. President; and I again say that it was only in view of what seemed to me to be an emergency that I was induced to take up this question. There is no particular reason why I should take up the question more than another Senator; but it seemed to me that there was an urgent necessity.

Mr. ROOT. There is no reason but that public spirit which the Senator from Idaho always exhibits.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is the amendment pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment is certainly pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was in hopes the Senator from Idaho would adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and also by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and that he would not press the amendment at this time, but let it take its regular course and go before the committee of which the distinguished Senator from New York is chairman, in order that the matter may be fully and carefully considered. It is a very important question. It has never been before any committee. I therefore am constrained, unless the Senator will withdraw——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to withdraw my presence from this discussion, but I did not yield to any Senator to make a point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood the Senator had yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from Idaho had yielded the floor. The Chair misunderstood the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall resume my seat. I merely want to have the question considered with sufficient deliberation and coolness at this time so that we will not lose an opportunity and then afterwards realize that we have lost the opportunity. I shall leave the amendment to take its own course.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have the floor now in my own right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought I had it before. I think the Senators from California ought to be consulted in this matter. They represent that great State, and really it is a State enterprise. While the Government is going to invite other nations, those Senators ought to be considered in the matter, and it ought to go before the committee to be considered carefully. Therefore I make the point of order that the amendment has not been estimated for, that it has never been before a committee, and that it is new legislation.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, before taking his seat, because then it would not be in order, I will state that before presenting this question I consulted both Senators from California, and the statement of what I intended to do met with their approval as expressed to me.

Mr. WARREN. Speaking on the point of order, it had been my intention, because of my earnest interest in this enterprise and my good wishes for it, to suggest to the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who knows perfectly well that the amendment is subject to a point of order, as it is to every Senator, that he ask the unanimous consent of the Senate; that then I would not make the point of order, and, if no one else did, the amendment could be considered.

The Senator himself, however, in his argument, has made it incumbent upon every member of the Committee on Appropriations—and certainly upon the chairman—to see that such an amendment shall not be allowed to go into the bill without the point of order being made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I beg pardon; I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming declines to yield.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator stated in his argument that it was a deficiency in legislation. Now, the Committee on Appropriations is hardly given either the duty or the privilege of making good all the deficiencies in legislation. That statement is true; there is a deficiency in legislation; but we are making deficiencies in appropriations to provide for such matters as have already been legislated for.

I noticed this morning, when the subject came up, that the chairman and several members of the Committee on Foreign Relations took a great interest in this matter, as they should. We also have present here the chairman and members of the Committee on Industrial Expositions, who should take charge of such legislation as that proposed. In my opinion, a measure of this kind ought to come from one or both of those committees, favorably recommended, before it is taken up by the Senate or even by the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, as to the opportunities that may follow, I do not see how the House can adjourn without presenting an urgent deficiency bill, because this bill carries no appropriation for their pages and they are without provision since July 1. So if this matter can be formulated and put in such a shape that unanimous consent can then be given to put it on an appropriation bill, it can come at that time as well as now; and so far as next autumn is concerned, we shall undoubtedly have an urgent deficiency bill in the first days of December. It is the usual case. I imagine that the House Members and Senators will desire to draw their travel allowance soon after they meet, and as the 1912 appropriation has already been exhausted in the payment of mileage for the present term, it, together with other matters, will bring up another bill of this character very early in December. In the meantime I presume we shall have one following this in a few weeks. But over and above all, this proposed legislation ought to be treated as a separate and independent measure before it approaches an appropriation bill.

The Senator from North Carolina, I understand, has made the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] raises the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the bill, and I desire to make a brief statement to the Senate in regard thereto. I do not indicate the point at which it is to come, but that can be easily determined if the Senate should adopt the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. Insert the following:

That jurisdiction is ceded to the State of Georgia over the following-described property, the title to which has been granted by the United States Government to the city of Atlanta, by deed dated November 11, 1910, to wit: Commencing at the corner of Marietta and Forsyth Streets and running thence northwest along Marietta Street 201.58 feet to Fairlie Street, thence northeast along Fairlie Street 105½ feet to an alley, thence southeast along the alley 201½ feet to Forsyth Street, thence southwest along Forsyth Street 110½ feet, to the beginning point at the corner of Marietta and Forsyth Streets.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senate that this is an emergency matter and involves the question of the jurisdiction of the State of Georgia over a piece of property within its borders to which the United States Government itself now has no title. The piece of land in question is that upon which is situate the building which was formerly the Government building in Atlanta. Recently the United States has procured another piece of land and has put up another Government building thereon. The ground in question was originally given by the city of Atlanta to the Government, upon which to erect the Government building for the accommodation of the post office and of the Federal courts. At the time when the new building was provided for an arrangement was made under which the Government of the United States would be paid for the old building and would return the land to the city of Atlanta. Of course, when the building was originally erected, the State of Georgia ceded jurisdiction to the United States Government over that piece of property, as is always required to be done. This proposed amendment is to supply what was an unintentional omission in the provision in the appropriation bill approved June 25, 1910, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government. In that provision occurs this language:

Atlanta, Ga., old post-office building: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to have appraised, in a fair and impartial manner, the old post-office building in the city of Atlanta, Ga., having in view the value of said building for municipal purposes, and to convey said building, together with the lot or lots heretofore donated by the city of Atlanta to the Government of the United States on which said building is situated, to the said city of Atlanta, on the payment by it into the Treasury of the United States of the amount of the appraised value of said building thus ascertained: Provided, That the acceptance of such conveyance by the city of Atlanta shall constitute a release of any and all obligations of the Government of the United States under the deed from the city of Atlanta to the United States or by the agreement referred to therein.

In pursuance of that clause the city of Atlanta has paid to the United States Government what was the appraised value of the property, and the Government of the United States has made a deed for the entire property, including the land, to the city of Atlanta; so that the Government of the United States has no interest in it whatever. The clause of the act from which I have just read should have contained the additional provision that the jurisdiction which had heretofore been ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States Government was receded to the State of Georgia. That was unintentionally omitted, and this amendment is simply for the purpose of suppying that omission.

As a practical question, I will simply state that because the city of Atlanta has bought this property from the Government of the United States to use it as a municipal building, it is a very grave question whether any of the official acts of the city can be properly performed within that building; whether its recorder's court can be held in it, and so forth; but what is equally important, in a more general way, the United States Government now has criminal jurisdiction over this piece of ground in the city of Atlanta to which it has no title and in which it has no interest whatever, and to-day if there were a murder committed upon the front steps of that building, which was formerly the Government building of the United States, the jurisdiction would be in the Federal courts and not in the State courts.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask under what circumstance the Government has criminal jurisdiction over that piece of ground?

Mr. BACON. Simply because when the Government of the United States had the property conveyed to it by an act of the Legislature of Georgia the jurisdiction was ceded to the United States Government; it is there now, and can never be otherwise unless the Congress of the United States recedes it to the State of Georgia.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator think that the recession by the United States would not in effect abolish the jurisdiction there?

Mr. BACON. The Government has not receded anything; it has simply deeded the property.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the jurisdiction went with the title. Can it be possible that the jurisdiction of the United States would remain after the United States ceased to have the basis upon which the jurisdiction rested? I should think that they would go and come together. The jurisdiction came with the title and would go with the title.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, the Senator might think that way, and other lawyers might think the other way. I confess that I do not agree with the Senator; but even if he were right, there is a question raised which affects material interests. It affects the question as to the legality of the conviction of any man who is tried in that court. It is now a pressing question from the fact that the city of Atlanta is issuing bonds, and the question has been raised by capitalists—we all know how sensitive capital is—as to whether or not a bond executed in that building, assuming to be within the jurisdiction of the State of Georgia, is a good bond when in fact, according to the papers at least, the jurisdiction is in the Federal Government. There is no doubt, I presume, as to the fact that the raising of such questions as to criminal jurisdiction would certainly result in almost interminable litigation and unnecessary delay.

I would not present this amendment, Mr. President, but for the fact that this is an emergency. I trust the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. The very interesting question is raised, Could the United States have jurisdiction in criminal cases where the title was not in the United States? Is there any instance——

Mr. BACON. I think the State of Georgia could cede, if it saw proper to do so, the jurisdiction over a piece of ground within its borders to the United States, whether the United States had title to it or not. Of course the State could do that.

Mr. HEYBURN. We could not confer jurisdiction to the United States anywhere on private property.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from Idaho enjoy discussing moot questions? What possible advantage can there be in raising the question? The adoption of this amendment will certainly dispose of the matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, the Senator asks that in rather a critical tone of voice.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I will withdraw the tone.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but a question is presented here involving a stated legal consequence of cession. Statements of that kind should not stand in the RECORD unchallenged, if other Senators have views that do not accord with them. I do not think that I owe any apology for having discussed this legal question, even though it may be a moot question. That is a privilege of a Senator, and the privileges of Senators are equal.

Mr. BACON. I have not asked for any apology from the Senator, nor do I consider that one is due. I simply desired, if possible, to convince the Senator that, even if his view of the question is a plausible one, it is better that the question should be settled and determined, rather than that it should be left to drag itself through the courts and the prolonged determination and appeals from one court to another.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not objecting to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BACON. The adoption of the amendment settles the whole controversy.

Mr. HEYBURN. I repeat I do not object to the Senator's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At what point does the Senator from Georgia desire that his amendment shall be inserted?

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that, with the Senator's consent, the amendment go in between lines 21 and 22, on page 3, with the heading "Treasury Department."

Mr. BACON. I shall be very glad to have the amendment inserted at that point, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified and inserted at the place indicated. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after the amendment just adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to it is proposed to insert:

Transportation of silver coin: For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $120,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I shall have to make the point of order against that amendment. I will withhold it, however, until the Senator from Washington may have an opportunity to speak upon it. In the meantime I wish to say that formerly appropriations for the transportation of silver coin were regularly made every year. They were made largely for the reason that it was sought to have a greater circulation of silver dollars and other silver coin, especially at points far away from the Treasury. The department finally ceased to estimate for the appropriation, and in a hearing, or, in fact, I might say, in several hearings, before the committee reasons were given why it was unnecessary to make the appropriation. Therefore the appropriation was omitted, and we are now without any estimate from the Treasury Department for such an item. Perhaps the Senator has information to the contrary, but the committee is without any estimate or without any suggestion from the department that it is necessary. In fact, on the contrary, we have the department's testimony that it is not necessary, and therefore the appropriation was omitted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I withhold the point of order until the Senator from Washington concludes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the amendment is in the language of the provision of law on this subject that we have had heretofore. It proposes to appropriate the amount that has heretofore been appropriated by Congress for this purpose.

I know that there has been quite a controversy with reference to this question and that the item was left out of the last appropriation bill and no provision was made for it. In my section of the country—and, I think, in other sections as well—there is quite a demand for legislation of this kind, because of peculiar conditions there. I have received a great many telegrams from business men and banks and business interests in our State urging that something of this kind be done, and be done immediately, on account of the necessity of business in the moving of the crops.

In the business of our State, especially, silver is used a great deal in the payment of hands at the close of each day's work. This has become quite a custom, in our section of the country at any rate, and it works a great hardship on the banks and business interests to have to bring silver coin into the country at their own expense.

I hope that the chairman of the committee will not make the point of order against the amendment, but let it be adopted and go to conference at any rate, because it is a matter of considerable importance in a business way, and especially in several sections of this country where they use silver coin to a very great extent in their daily business.

As to the expense involved, of course silver coin is furnished by the Treasury Department only upon deposit by the applicant of an equivalent amount of money, and it is simply the transportation charges that are paid by the Government. Though I recognize that the amendment is subject to the point of order, I trust the chairman of the committee will not make it, but that he will allow the amendment to be adopted. I do not care to take any more of the time of the Senate on the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I feel I will have to insist on the point of order; but I shall be very glad to cooperate with the Senator if the Treasury Department feels that the proposed legislation is necessary and will cooperate with the legislative branch in regard to it.

All the paper money and gold money which is now transported is transported at the expense of the banks. The appropriation proposed in the amendment, in my judgment, is entirely too large even if we were to make one, because it can apply only to fractional coin.

Mr. JONES. Of course the Secretary would not have to use any more of the appropriation than was necessary to meet the demands of business.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator would take the matter up and obtain more complete information as to the necessity of his amendment I should feel different about the matter in connection with a later bill, but this proposition has neither the estimate of the department nor the indorsement of any committee. I feel that I shall have to object to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I want to suggest to the Senator that, so far as the necessity for this amendment is concerned, it is an emergency matter. The business interests require it now, and unless it is done within a month or two the necessity will have passed. I suggest to the Senator that the bill has come here very suddenly——

Mr. WARREN. It has been two years since this provision was omitted from the general appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. That is true; but we have suffered by reason of that omission all that time, and we do not think we ought to suffer longer. If the matter could go to conference, the Senator could probably get more information from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to it; and if the amount proposed is too large, it can be there cut down. The Senator is aware, of course, that this bill has come over rather unexpectedly and has been reported out of the committee hurriedly, so that I have not had an opportunity to secure this information from the department; but it could be secured by the conference committee before the bill is brought back.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say in passing that the bill has been here a week or more, so that we have not unduly hurried it in any manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, when the Senate took the adjournment yesterday I was calling attention to a paragraph in the report of the Ways and Means Committee, a report made by the Democratic majority of that committee, recognizing the fact that a great injustice would be done to the farmers of this country by the passage of the so-called reciprocity agreement. In that same report the committee signifies a willingness to correct, at least in a small degree, this injustice by passing the so-called free-list bill. I asked Senators on the other side of the Chamber if they were willing to join with me to carry out the suggestion made by this committee.

Mr. REED. I got in yesterday when the Senator was referring, or began to refer, to this report. I want to ask him to what report he is referring?

Mr. GRONNA. It is a report made by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee on the free-list bill—by the Democratic members of the committee.

Mr. REED. On the free-list bill?

Mr. GRONNA. On the free-list bill.

Now, I want to ask Senators on the other side if they are willing to take the advice of a majority of the majority of the Members of the House of Representatives and correct the injustices which they admit will result from this measure? I want to know now if any of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber will join with me to vote to attach the free-list bill to this reciprocity agreement? I greatly admire the Democratic Members of the House for their honesty and their courage in admitting to the country that they have not only made a mistake, but that they have passed a bill that is doing not only an injury, but an injustice to the American farmer.

So I pause for some Senator on the other side to say whether or not he is willing to help us on this side—at least some of us—to correct this iniquitous measure.

Mr. President, it is evident that the Members on the other side of this Chamber are unwilling to agree to such a proposition.

I impute no motives to any Senator on this floor or to any Member of the other body when I say that it has been intimated that it is not the intention that the so-called free-list bill and the other bills shall pass. I do not believe that that is true. I have no reason to believe that the members on the other side of the Chamber are not just as anxious to pass laws that are wise and beneficial for all the people in this country as we are on this side of the Chamber, but the majority of the House have said that they have passed a bill which they now recognize and admit is doing a great injustice to the farmer of this country.

We do not need all the votes on the other side. Give us a few votes, and there are enough Senators on this side who will help you to correct the inequalities of the pending measure.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator has called attention to the majority report of the House committee, and uses it as a text to declare that its purport is that the reciprocity measure has taken away the benefits to the farmer and will work incalculable injury to him. For some reason he has chosen to take a Democratic report for his text. He is now advocating placing upon this reciprocity bill certain amendments in the nature of what are known as the farmers' free-list bill and other bills with reference to which he read the report of the Democratic members.

I want to ask him, now that he is advocating the addition of those measures, or substantially those measures, to this bill, if he agrees with this report of the members of his own party. I desire to read it.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The pending bill was ordered reported not only without investigation, but without the semblance of consideration by the committee. It was stated in the committee that it would reduce revenue about $1,500,000, and it is now admitted that it will cut down the revenue by more than $10,000,000, and later admissions are likely substantially to increase this amount. The measure was christened by its authors "the farmers' free-list bill," and it represents a transparent attempt at the manufacture of political capital. In view of the title which its friends have given it, it would at least have been proper to investigate the effect it is likely to have upon the agricultural interests. The President of the United States felt it his duty to call Congress in special session to consider the Canadian reciprocity bill. That bill has already been acted upon by the House, and instead of bringing forward tariff bills, ill considered or not considered at all, for the purpose of administering political soothing sirup to particular classes of population, the undersigned are of opinion that the interests of the farmer and of everybody else will be subserved if the country is spared from further political exploitation and further tariff legislation at the present time and adjournment is taken promptly after the reciprocity bill shall have been finally acted upon.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator if he agrees with this statement, coming from his own party, that Congress should adjourn without doing anything more than to pass the reciprocity bill, and if the things he is now advocating are to be classified as political soothing sirup?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Missouri has not answered my question.

Mr. REED. Oh, but whether I answered the Senator's question yesterday is hardly pertinent to the inquiry I am now making as to whether the measures he is now advocating he regards as political soothing sirup.

Mr. GRONNA. I have asked the question again this morning, and I have asked it in good faith, whether or not the Senators on the other side will join with me and others to amend this bill at least in a small way and take away some of the objectionable features in the so-called reciprocity agreement. The Senator from Missouri proceeds to make a speech and to read a lengthy report, and I shall in my own way answer that some other time. I propose at this time to proceed with my speech on the pending measure.

So far as reducing the cost of living is concerned, reducing the tariff on the raw material can result only in reducing the price that the manufacturer pays for it. So long as the protection is retained on the manufactured product, little if any of this will be handed down to the consumer of the finished product. If the intention of this agreement was to reduce the cost of living, the tariff should have been removed from the manufactures which the average man buys, and not as against Canada alone—a country that does not sell us any manufactures and whose manufacturers can not compete with ours—but as against countries where the manufacturing industry has been fully established, such countries as England and Germany. The only manufactured products off which the duties have been removed, of which there is any possibility of Canada selling us any, are unplaned lumber, pulp wood, and print paper valued at less than 4 cents a pound. The unplaned lumber is not the kind the average consumer buys, however, and it would seem that the main benefit to be derived from its free admission would go to the lumber mills which will be able to import the unplaned lumber free of duty and will have a protection of from 50 cents to $1.50 on the process of planing it. I do not know that it has been explained why print paper valued at more than 4 cents a pound is not to be admitted free. I have been informed that the paper used by magazines is valued at 5 cents and upwards.

It is evident that the effect of this agreement will not be to reduce the price to the consumer, and it is further evident that the farmer will receive no compensation for surrendering his home market in the extension of his foreign market, and that any benefit from the lowered duty on lumber will be so small as to be insignificant compared with the possible loss due to the lowered price of his products. As I stated previously, if the purpose was to reduce either the price of the raw material or the price of the finished product, in either case the measure should remove the duties as against all countries and not merely against Canada. By removing the duties on Canadian products and retaining them on the same products when produced in other countries, we merely give a measure of protection to the Canadian producer.

It is to be expected in a reciprocity measure that there will be a mutual benefit, that if we open our markets to the producers of a country that country will open its markets to our producers. If two countries produce the same products, it is manifest that there can be little if any advantage accruing to either from an exchange of these products or from the establishment of reciprocity between them, if the market conditions in the two are the same. If, however, the consumption in one country is greater than in the other so that the prices in its markets are higher, the producers of the second country will be benefited by admission to the markets of the first country, and the producers of the first country will be harmed as the free admission of the increased supply will naturally force prices down. To what point they will be lowered will of course depend on the amount exported by the second country. Where, however, two countries do not produce the same products, and each consequently has to import the products of the other, both may be benefited by a wisely arranged reciprocity agreement, whereby the markets of the producers of both countries will be extended and the supplies available to the consumers of both countries increased. In such a case, it is conceivable how an arrangement can be made which will lower the price to the consumers of each country and increase the prices received by the producers. This can not be brought about, however, by mere mutuality of duty removal. If the first country removes the duties on the goods which it does not produce, it opens its market for these goods to the second country on better terms than to other countries, and the probable result will be a lowering of the prices of those goods. The second country entering this market at an advantage compared with other foreign countries, will find that its producers will receive better prices for those products. If, however, the second country removes the duties on those same goods which it produces and which the first country does not produce, it is evident that so far as the extension of trade is concerned, there is no mutuality of benefit, and that it is not a reciprocity agreement, although both countries have removed certain duties. This Canadian reciprocity agreement belongs to this class. We open our markets to the Canadian products by removing the duties on the products which Canada expects to sell to us—natural products, and Canada reciprocates by removing those same duties—duties on goods which we do not sell to Canada and which we do not have the slightest expectation of selling to Canada. So far as the removal of duties is concerned, this agreement has absolutely nothing of the nature of a reciprocity agreement.

By the terms of this agreement and the measure now before us, we give Canada such a preference in the matter of tariff as we have given to no other country. We admit all of the natural products of Canada free, and such of her manufactures as she has any hopes of exporting. We treat her far more favorably than we do Cuba or even the Philippines. With all the sympathy which we have had for the Pearl of the Antilles, and with all the responsibility which we have felt for her future welfare, political as well as industrial and commercial, we did not feel that we could do more for her than to admit her sugar 20 per cent cheaper than we do sugar from the rest of the world. We did not say to her that we stood ready to buy whatever she wanted to sell us, free of duty. In the case of the Philippines we decided to admit her products free of duty, but ever mindful of our own producers we limited it, for the present, at any rate, to 300,000 tons of sugar a year and varying amounts of tobaccos and cigars. Only in the case of Canada is it urged that we must admit all of her products free of duty, even though her products are such as we can produce ourselves in sufficient quantities to supply our home consumption, which is not the case with the products of Cuba and the Philippines. In return for our concessions to Cuba and the Philippines we received certain concessions, and we are favored in the matter of trade with them as no other nation is on the face of the globe. How is it in the case of Canada? In return for our immense gift to her, do we receive anything in return, and are we favored more than other nations are? There are gentlemen who appear to find something worth taking in the concessions that Canada has made in the matter of tariff duties, but I do not believe there is anyone who will say that we are favored to the extent that Cuba and the Philippines favor us. I have prepared a table showing a comparison of the rates which we are to enjoy and the preferential rates that Canada grants to England, which I wish to insert at this point and ask to have made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be inserted as requested.

The table is as follows:

Comparison of proposed reciprocal rates with British preferential rates.

Mr. GRONNA. In this table I have not included such articles as wheat, fish, print paper, pulp wood, lumber, and so forth, which England would not export to Canada and which we do not export to Canada. A glance at this table will convince anyone that we are not given a preference over England, but that England retains her preference over the United States. The reciprocal tariff rates which are to be granted the United States adhere very closely to the intermediate rates, which it is the practice of Canada to grant to other countries making concessions in their tariffs. In other words, so far as Canadian trade is concerned, the manufacturers who hope to extend their exports to Canada will find themselves on the same footing as manufacturers in other countries to which Canada has or may grant the same concessions, and at a decided disadvantage as compared with the British manufacturers. Such countries as have secured the benefit of the Canadian intermediate tariff seem to have done so at the cost of concessions very slight as compared with that which we are asked to grant. To sum up this phase of the question, we have favored Canada in the matter of trade as no other country, not barring Cuba and the Philippines, but Canada has only placed us on the same footing with other countries and still favors England at our expense. Some gentlemen may think that this is a good bargain, but it appears to me that our negotiators were caught napping, unless their instructions were to secure an agreement at any price, so long as the cost was paid only by our own farmers. The slight reductions Canada has granted in the matter of duties on manufactures has been pointed to as one of the benefits of this agreement, and it has been proclaimed that our exports to Canada should largely increase because of these.

There is one thing that must not be overlooked in this connection. Canada has favored the English manufacturer as against the American manufacturer, and will continue to do so after this agreement is adopted. If in spite of that we sell more to her than England does, there must be another reason which a slight change in tariff duties will not change one way or the other. Whether it be the quality of our goods or what it may be I shall not stop to discuss, but it is evident that the Canadian consumer prefers to pay the higher duty on the American product in preference to buying the English product although the duty on the latter is lower. In such a case, where the importing country does not manufacture enough to supply her own market but must import, the consumer clearly pays the tariff, and the result of the slight reductions in the Canadian duties, if there is any result, will be the lowering of the price paid by the Canadian consumer and not the increase in the price received by the American manufacturer. However desirable a thing it may be to secure lower prices for the Canadian consumers, I do not believe that we should purchase it at the cost of the market of our farmers, especially as Canada has it in her own hands to secure this reduction by lowering or removing her own tariffs. If the Canadian consumers are oppressed by too high prices, due to the Canadian tariff, let them apply to their own Government to take it off. I see no reason why we should buy tariff reductions for the Canadian consumers, and no one else would see any if it were not for the fact that the farmers are expected to pay the bill.

Mr. President, it is noticeable how differently we are expected to treat Canada than we treat all other countries. By this agreement, we are granted not the minimum tariffs by Canada—those are reserved to England and British dependencies—but her intermediate tariffs. In return we furnish a free market for practically everything that Canada may wish to sell. In the case of Germany, we find the following results from the operation of the maximum and minimum provisions of the Payne Tariff Law. This is taken from the report of the President on the operations of this law, submitted June 9, 1910, in response to a resolution passed by the House of Representatives:

The negotiations resulted in Germany granting to the United States her full conventional tariff rates in return for the minimum tariff of the United States, this being an exchange of minimum for minimum. The United States was thus placed on exactly the same terms as all other countries to which Germany had granted her conventional tariff in pursuance of treaty stipulations.

In the case of France, the following was the result:

The basis of settlement with France upon which the minimum tariff of the United States was granted to that country was that France granted her minimum rates to the United States on about 80 numbers of the tariff where two rates existed. These cover manufactured articles most important in the export trade of the United States, including agricultural and including various forms of implements, tools, and machinery on which this Government had long sought equality of tariff treatment. In addition, assurances were given as to the maintenance of many general tariff rates in the French schedules, the understanding being that if certain rates are lowered the United States shall be accorded such reduction. The French rates on all edible oils were equalized, thus removing discrimination against cottonseed oil, which for edible purposes is a distinctively American product.

The trade relations with Austria-Hungary were settled on this basis:

The Government of Austria-Hungary has, in exchange for the minimum tariff of the United States, granted its complete conventional tariff rates to the products of the United States imported into Austria-Hungary. * * *

As a further result of the negotiations, the Government of Austria-Hungary has agreed to take the necessary legislative steps looking to the reduction of the present discriminating duty on cottonseed oil and its equalization with the lower duties of competing vegetable oils.

The negotiations with Italy had the following result:

Italy has granted her complete conventional tariff rates to imports from the United States and has made certain administrative changes favorable to American commerce, including the classification of gum lumber in such manner as to permit its admission free of duty and the less rigorous application of the sanitary regulations governing the admission of American pharmaceutical and medicinal preparations.

In the case of Brazil we obtained certain concessions, as shown in the statement given below:

Prior to the beginning of tariff negotiations with Brazil the Government of that country had been granting a preferential reduction of 20 per cent in favor of 11 classes of American products, limited to one year but subject to renewal upon approval of the Brazilian Congress. These articles were as follows: Paints, wheat flour, pianos, condensed milk, scales, watches, clocks, manufactures of rubber, typewriters, windmills, and refrigerators. Through the representations of the department the above list has been increased so as to include the following additional classes, namely, cement, corsets, dried fruits, and school furniture and desks.

In regard to the relations with Canada, the report has the following:

The question requiring adjustment with the Dominion of Canada grew out of the Franco-Canadian treaty which was put in force between the two countries February 1, 1910. The Canadian tariff consists of three schedules—general, intermediate, and British preferential. The British preferential rates are extended only to the United Kingdom and to various British colonies. The intermediate rates are the minimum rates as to all other countries. Under the terms of the Franco-Canadian treaty France was given a series of intermediate rates and in addition a small list of special rates applying to peculiarly French products. By the operation of the favored-nation treatment the treaty rates were extended automatically to several countries besides France, some of whose products competed with the products of the United States in the Canadian market. This question was adjusted satisfactorily by the extension on the part of Canada of the intermediate rates of the Canadian tariff to various exports of the United States.

These concessions, some of them important and others less so, were not obtained at the expense of our surrendering our markets to the various countries, but merely by the operation of the maximum and minimum provision of the Payne tariff law. In the German markets we are on the same standing as other countries. In the French markets most of our exports are given the same treatment as those of other countries. In the case of Austria-Hungary the complete conventional tariff rates have been granted us. No country has any advantage in the markets of that country that the United States does not have. And all of these concessions have been obtained without our granting those countries any considerations or favors not enjoyed by all other countries that treat our goods fairly. So far as I know, the maximum rates of the Payne law are not enforced against any country. In the case of Canada certain of our goods were granted the intermediate rate in return for our minimum rates, and now we are to purchase the application of the intermediate rates on a few more articles by surrendering the home markets of our farmers. For, with the exception of such agricultural products as Canada will export to us and we shall not export to her now or in the future, the rates agreed to by Canada in this agreement are her intermediate rates, practically. Certainly, this or any other country never made a trade agreement in which they gave so much for so little. It is almost enough to convince us that in the matter of tariff bargaining our representatives are not the equals of those of other countries, and that it would be well to provide that in the future no bargains must be attempted unless there is an expert present who has some knowledge of what is given and what is received, and who knows the probable effects on the industries of this country of removing the tariff duties on its products.

But even such favors as we have received from Canada in this agreement, if we grant for the sake of argument that they are worth anything, are not to be reserved for us. Under the favored-nation clause of its treaties Canada will be forced to extend the same concessions to other countries. Lest anyone should believe that there is any doubt as to this I will quote what the English tariff commission says in regard to it:

Mr. Fielding, Canadian minister of finance, announced in the Dominion House of Commons on February 16, 1911, that Canada is under obligation to extend most-favored-nation treatment to 12 countries, namely, Argentine, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela. France is a favored-nation country to the extent of the articles specified in Schedules B and C of the Franco-Canadian treaty. The 12 above-named countries are enjoying the benefits of the French treaty, and in regard to the proposed arrangement with the United States Mr. Fielding said:

"As respects the dutiable schedules in the agreement with the United States, the concessions to be granted to the United States are largely the same as have already been granted to France and the favored-nation countries. As respects a large part of the list, therefore, no additional advantages will be enjoyed by such countries. There are, however, a few articles in the French schedules which in the agreement with the United States are made free or dutiable at lower rates; in these cases the advantages granted to the United States will extend also to France and the favored-nation countries. In the case of a few articles which are not to be found in the French treaty the favored-nation countries will be entitled to receive concessions on the same terms as the United States, but France will not be so entitled. Although not arising from any agreement, in no case has any advantage been granted to any foreign country that did not at the same time extend to all parts of the British Empire. In the few cases in which the rates to be established are lower than those already enjoyed by British countries the reductions will apply to such countries. There is no understanding of any kind except what is found in the correspondence and schedules already before the House."

From this statement it is seen that Canadian concessions to the United States are to be extended to all favored-nation countries, and that therefore the area of competition which the British manufacturers will have to meet in future in Canada will be extended to all the competitive products from these countries, which will enjoy together with the United States either free entry or reduced rates in Canada, in every case diminishing the present preference upon British goods.

It will be noted that Germany is not included in the above enumeration of favored-nation countries. A trade treaty is contemplated, however, under an arrangement made between the Canadian and German Governments in 1910.

Thus it appears that not only are we not to be placed on the same footing as England is in the matter of trade, but that after surrendering our market in agricultural products we find that such concessions as we did obtain through these means are to be extended automatically to other countries. The only conclusion which I can reach is that our manufacturers who may have hopes of increasing their trade with Canada will find that they will derive little benefit from this agreement. England will still have a preference, and the manufacturers of other foreign countries will be on the same footing as ours. The only ones who, it appears, will reap any benefits, so far as the United States is concerned, are the railroads, millers, packers, brewing interests, and certain large newspapers.

Further, I understand that several European nations are planning to seek admission for the same products on the same terms granted to Canada, under the most-favored-nation clause. While the State Department will no doubt adhere to the position that the most-favored-nation clause does not operate to require this country to grant any concessions unless corresponding concessions are granted by the other country—although this construction has been given up by all European countries—it may be suggested that there are a number of countries that would be glad to secure admission of their agricultural products in return for a pseudo admission of our agricultural products, especially countries which produce products which they are confident we will not sell them, but which they can produce at an advantage compared to our farmers, and place on our markets at a profit. Argentina, Brazil, and Australia, for instance, would no doubt like to sell us cattle. Mexico might not object to having the opportunity to export them for the benefit of our farmers. Other countries would have other products which they could sell us with profit. The duties on manufactures could not be reduced to any extent in this manner, as they have been carefully guarded in the making of this agreement. As the President said in his speech at Fall River, Mass., on June 23: "No protected interest will be injured."

It may be interesting to consider how men outside of the United States consider this agreement. Premier Laurier of Canada makes the following statements in an interview published in the May number of the Columbian magazine:

We are above all an agricultural people, our chief wealth is the growth of those products of the Temperate Zone, fruits, cereals, and vegetables; and it is our boast—but a boast founded on actual experience—that in cereals, fruits, and vegetables we can, without exaggeration, beat the world. At the northern extremity of the Temperate Zone, our cereals have more strength, our fruit has better flavor, our vegetables have more delicacy than similar productions from other parts of the world; and under free competition, not barred in any way by tariff legislation, they will displace all other products on the tables of the wealthy. Our object to-day is to open the door of the American market, to open the door of a nation of 90,000,000, which has been closed to us the last 50 years. * * *

Canada consumes only 50 per cent of her production of wheat. Where is the balance to go? We have the English market. The English market is quite ample enough to take the surplus production of wheat in this country for many years to come, although we are sure the production will increase tenfold by and by. But there are other products than wheat which the British market can not absorb, or can not absorb with the same convenience as the American market can. We have in the Province of Quebec natural meadows, which require no tillage, and upon which the best of timothy has been grown, not for 50 years, but for 100 years. All along the two shores of Lake St. Peter there are natural meadows, a few inches only above the level of the water, which are yearly flooded, and which, to the knowledge of everyone in the Province, have been for 100 years or more growing hay and nothing else. The counties of Berthier, Montmorency, and St. Maurice, on the north shore, and the counties of Nicolet, Yamaska, and Richelieu on the south, are so situated that they have a very considerable population who are growers of hay and for whom this treaty, if it becomes law, will be a positive boon. To-day they can not sell any hay in the United States, because there is a duty of $4 a ton. Let the duty be removed, and then immediately there will be an immense trade in that section of the community, as there was some 30 years ago. The same thing applies in the case of eggs, poultry, and mining products. For this reason it is to our advantage that we should have not only the British market but the American market also.

Then there is the cattle trade. Years ago we had a cattle trade with Great Britain. * * * If we are not able to sell all the cattle we can raise in Great Britain there is a more ready market in the United States.

This agreement is concerned chiefly with natural products. There are no manufactured products dealt with in this agreement except agricultural implements. There is a vast difference between reciprocity in natural products and reciprocity in manufactured goods. This is the reason we have acted with this prudence. I do not know who was present at the conference which took place between our two representatives and Mr. Knox, but it is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products than they were in natural products. But our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting this agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements.

The Canadian premier makes no secret of why the Canadian Government entered into this agreement, but plainly states that it was to give the Canadian farmer free entry to our markets for his products, and makes no attempt to conceal his belief that the farmers of his country will benefit greatly from this privilege. He further states than the Canadian negotiators refused to agree to reciprocity in manufactured products other than agricultural implements. Some persons may be curious to know why an exception was made in the case of agricultural implements. The reason for the willingness, which Premier Laurier expresses, to grant reciprocity in agricultural implements was no doubt the desire to reduce somewhat the cost of these to the Canadian farmer, as the opening up of the Canadian northwest, which is going on at a rapid rate, will create a larger demand than the Canadian manufacturers can hope to supply for years. The agreement, however, still retains a duty of 15 per cent on these articles.

The British tariff commission in its report on this agreement makes the following statements:

While, therefore, little opportunity would seem to be given by the agreement for the United States to capture any Canadian import trade in these articles, there appears to be a large area for an increase in Canadian exportation to the United States, and consequent diversion southward of Canadian food and agricultural products that now come to the United Kingdom. These figures relate solely to the import trade of each country, and, seeing that the removal of the tariff barriers between Canada and the United States makes the North American continent a single trade territory in which Canadian and United States producers will compete on even terms, the balance of advantage in respect of these goods should rest with those who have the greatest potentialities of production, namely, the Canadians.

The commission was speaking of the effect of the removal of the duties on natural products. It further says:

Canada's opportunities are especially marked in the case of wheat. Under the present duty of 25 cents per bushel, Canada supplies only $5,000 worth for consumption in the United States. * * * The ability of Canada to take advantage of this new field of export must depend partly upon her capacity of competitive production and also upon the extent to which her export of wheat to the United Kingdom will be diverted through the removal of the United States duty.

The British tariff commission appears to have no more doubt than has Premier Laurier, that the result of this agreement will be the invasion of our home market by the Canadian farmer and that the advantage in the competition for markets will rest with the Canadians. The invasion of our market by Canadian farm products must inevitably result in the displacing of part of the production of the American farmer, and it is amazing that anyone will stand up and say that this agreement will in no way affect him or the prices which he received.

Mr. President, I desire to ask to have printed an article which appeared in a Canadian newspaper called the Globe, known as Canada's national newspaper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The article referred to is as follows:

[The Globe, Canada's national newspaper, Toronto, Wednesday, Apr. 26, 1911.]

BARLEY AND THE TARIFF.

Canada knows by experience the effects of light and heavy tariffs on the barley market. It grows the finest quality of barley in America for malting purposes, and for many years it supplied the United States with the bulk of the grain that was malted in that country. In the reciprocity years of 1854–1866 its harvests were reaped to supply that market, and the farmers of Ontario especially grew rich by the barley trade. Duties were imposed at the close of that term, and for the next quarter of a century they ranged from 10 to 15 cents per bushel. But this barrier had little effect, and year after year the exports were maintained at a pretty constant rate. Beginning with 1876, when separate figures for barley and rye began to be kept in our trade tables, the quantity and value of barley exports to the United States for 17 years, or until the McKinley tariff of 30 cents per bushel came into operation, were as shown in the following table for fiscal years:

Years.	Bushels.	Values.
1877	6,243,033	4,503,117
1878	6,498,444	3,787,718
1879	5,193,324	4,643,048
1880	6,732,403	4,184,007
1881	8,724,931	6,272,998
1882	11,577,251	10,105,556
1883	8,741,626	6,245,263
1884	7,700,581	5,054,144
1885	9,028,314	5,477,441
1886	8,528,287	5,708,130
1887	9,437,717	5,245,968
1888	9,360,521	6,488,317
1889	9,934,501	6,454,603
1890	9,939,745	4,582,562
1891	4,732,953	2,849,269
1892	2,721,168	1,354,485
Total	135,279,351	90,323,453

The fiscal year 1891, when the high tariff came into operation, showed a noticeable decrease in the exports, and in the following year they were reduced to about one-fourth of the exports of 1890, but the average for the whole period was 7,957,000 bushels, with an average value of $5,313,000.

In the following 17 years, when the duty was kept up at a rate of 30 cents per bushel most of the time and of 30 per cent part of the time, the quantity and value of our exports were as shown in the next table:

Years.	Bushels.	Values.
1893	1,431,398	$638,271
1894	493,551	216,493
1895	1,674,193	706,586
1896	787,787	297,438
1897	1,246,343	371,633
1898	84,083	28,867
1899	122,374	59,158
1900	164,468	77,754
1901	190,547	85,927
1902	17,461	9,499
1903	37,112	17,148
1904	86,175	39,036
1905	101,111	46,225
1906	47,245	21,645
1907 (nine months)	19,094	8,258
1908	210,788	139,573
1909	266,096	144,660
Total	6,979,826	2,908,171

In these 17 years, under a tariff of 30 cents, or 30 per cent per bushel, the yearly average fell in quantity to 410,578 bushels and in value to $171,069; and the total loss in the 17 years, compared with the previous period, was in quantity 128,300,000 bushels and in value $87,415,282.

This was a serious loss to the farmers of Canada, or rather to the farmers of Ontario, who had been the producers of the barley, and the farmers of the United States have not yet replaced it by barley of their own growing. Glucose has largely taken its place, which is a poor and harmful article, calculated to promote kidney troubles for the consumers of lager beer.

One other fact deserves to be mentioned. In the first period of 17 years, when the United States tariff was moderately low, the average price of Canadian barley shipped to that country was, according to the trade tables, about 67 cents per bushel, and the average in the next 17 years was under 42 cents per bushel, or 25 cents per bushel less.

With barley on the free list, it is certain that our old market for this grain would again be fully restored. Ontario, with its greater capacity, would grow more than ever before to supply a larger market for consumption, and Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta would join it in the same American market, increased in population by close upon 29,000,000 since the McKinley Act destroyed the trade 20 years ago.

He is no friend of the farmers of Canada who blocks the way to win back for us this great trade, and he is a poor sort of politician who will lend himself to any interest which would block the way.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, Canada has long sought reciprocity with the United States in natural products. There are certain reasons, however, why the Canadian Government should be particularly anxious to enter into an agreement of this kind at this time, although it is not to be presumed that any government in our neighbor on the north would at any time refuse to accept such a gratuitous gift as this agreement hands it. What is known as the Canadian Northwest extends from the Red River of the North to the Rockies. It is a new country. A very large proportion of the settlers in this section have come from the United States. These people do not feel the bonds of the British Empire; they do not feel that they have any kinship with the people of the eastern Provinces of Canada; their relatives and friends are all south of the border line, except such as have emigrated with them. They have no interest in England and no particular love for the rest of the Dominion. They did not leave this country from any wish to give up their American citizenship, but because they believed that that part of Canada offered greater advantages than did the United States. They would have been better pleased if the new lands had been in the domain of Uncle Sam, but since it was not they accepted the Canadian Government as part of the bargain whereby they became owners of their lands. They know, however, even if some of the supporters and advocates of this measure in this country do not, that they are receiving 10 cents less for their wheat than their brothers on this side of the line. In many, if not most, instances the difference is greater. The Canadian Government is also aware of the difference in price.

The farmers of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba have begun to look with longing eyes toward our markets. Every time that they took a load of wheat to market the fact was impressed upon them that the American farmer was better situated with respect to price. They also possibly began to reflect that there are other ways of securing free admission to the markets of the United States besides negotiating reciprocity treaties, as I do not suppose that they even dared to hope that the United States would accept such an agreement as arranged for us by the President. It was no doubt recalled to them that there was a time when the United States had strong hopes—I might say expectations—of extending her dominion over the territory to our north. They could not help but remember that there is no tariff wall between the different States. With the increasing difference in price of American and Canadian wheat, due to the fact that in this country our consumption is increasing faster than our production, while in Canada the production is increasing much more rapidly than the consumption, the desire of the farmers of the Canadian Northwest to secure an entrance to the markets of the United States would grow stronger and the discussion of means would naturally follow. There is no reason to believe that the Canadian Government failed to perceive what the drift of sentiment in this section would inevitably be, and there is every reason to believe that it was anxious to secure to its northwestern farmers every advantage which they would have had as residents of the United States.

At this juncture the President of the United States steps in and offers to give the Canadian farmers the very thing they want—the wheat market of the United States. With practically no consideration in return he will surrender to them the markets of the farmers of his own country. He has not the power to do this alone, but he will make the agreement and use all the power of his high office to force Congress to enact legislation carrying out the agreement. Is it any wonder that the Canadian Government was eager to accept this arrangement? While the Canadian Government may have reflected that the great flood of Canadian wheat will force the wheat market of the United States to an export level, and that the agreement will thus benefit the Canadian farmer little at this time, it also no doubt had its eye on the future wheat market of the United States, aiming to displace our home-grown wheat in our own markets. If this agreement is ratified, we shall in a large measure surrender the growing of wheat to Canada; lands which can produce other farm products will be devoted to the production of those products, and lands which because of their location or for other reasons can not produce anything except grains at a profit will continue to do so if it can be done in competition with Canadian grains, and if it can not be done the lands must necessarily in time become again a waste. The diversion of lands from wheat growing to the production of other farm products will necessarily affect farmers who may not feel the Canadian competition directly. While the State of North Dakota will perhaps be hit harder than any other State the effect will extend in varying degrees to every State.

Whatever the immediate and ultimate effect on the price that the Canadian farmer will receive may be, however, the Canadian Government, if this measure becomes law, will have removed one cause of dissatisfaction among its northwestern farmers, and it will thus have strengthened the Dominion and made more secure its future as a nation independent of the United States. Those in this country who favor this agreement because they believe it to be a step toward annexation should pause and reflect whether the Canadian Government may not have given some thought to the future of its own country, and whether the men composing it may not be more correct judges of the conditions and of the character of the people within their boundaries than men on this side of the line. If the Government at Ottawa believed that this is a step toward annexation, it would certainly be the last to press for the ratification of the agreement.

Mr. President, whatever tariff policy we may adopt in the future, it must be applied with even-handed justice to all industries and all classes. I may be in error, but it is my impression that the Republican Party has been in power as long as it has because the people have had confidence that whatever mistakes of judgment it might make it would always try to treat all classes and industries fairly and would not intentionally discriminate against one section or industry in favor of another; and I may say that the result of last fall's elections was due to the fact that the people of this country had had their confidence shaken in the ability of the party to hand out justice to all concerned when it came to the matter of determining what measure of protection each industry was to receive. The measure now before us is anything but just. Whether we believe in a protective tariff or in a tariff for revenue only or in complete free trade, the only basis on which any of these policies can be permanently enforced is the treatment of all concerned alike. This measure is a jumble of free trade and protection; at first glance it appears to be an inexplicable mixture, but as a person studies it carefully it becomes apparent that there was a method in its framing; he can not help but notice that the industries of this country seem to have been divided into two classes, one of which is to be favored and the other is not to be favored; one of them is to suffer all the disadvantages which may arise from it, and the other to reap such advantages as may accrue; one of them to receive no benefits, and the other to bear none of the burdens; the agricultural industry to be deprived of such protection as it enjoys, and the manufacturing industry to retain all its present protection; the agricultural interests to be asked to share their market with the producers of a foreign nation and to receive in return no extension of their market, and the manufacturing interests to retain their domestic markets and to receive some concession in the matter of foreign markets. The only policy in accordance with which this agreement can have been made is the policy of free raw materials for our manufacturers and protection for their products; free trade in what the manufacturer has to buy and protection for what he sells, and conversely, free trade in what the farmer has to sell and protection for what he has to buy. And yet some people appear to be astonished and the President is impatient because he has to discuss the advantages that are to be derived from the adoption of this agreement. And the farmers are accused of failing to consider this agreement from a broad standpoint and of measuring it by the narrow yardstick of their own interests.

Mr. President, there was a time when a man having in mind the interests of those who till the soil in this country was in no danger of being accused of narrowness. There was a time when those charged with the responsibility of administering our Government thought it worth while to consider the needs of the farmer. There was a time when the idea that it is our first duty to increase our trade with other nations, no matter what effect such increase may have on our own industries, had not taken the hold it seems to have to-day. Those who urge the increased trade with Canada that will result from this agreement ignore the fact that this increase will consist merely in increasing her exports of agricultural products to this country. I confess I can not see how it is going to benefit our Nation to have Canada's millions and hundreds of millions of bushels of grain pouring over our borders, although I can see how it will put millions of dollars into the vaults of the Great Northern and other railway companies, whose presidents are now industriously engaged in urging the need of looking at this proposal from a "broad standpoint." The broadness of the view of Mr. James J. Hill is likely to be, as a North Dakota farmer expressed it in a letter to me, "about 100 feet wide and 1,000 miles long." I do not find fault with Mr. Hill for considering the advantages which his railroad and the coffers of his railroad company will derive from the importation of Canadian grain, but I do find fault with him for stating that the farmers are generally for this measure—a statement which I do not see how a man who keeps his ear as close to the ground as he does can make—and for attacking those who oppose this agreement as unjust to the agricultural interests as narrow, demagogical, prejudiced, and self-seeking. I venture the assertion that even Mr. Hill will in the long run find that this measure is a mistake. The prosperity of his railroad must ultimately depend more on the prosperity of the farmer in this country than it does on the welfare of the Canadian farmer, and if the Northwestern farmer suffers because of the adoption of an unjust policy it will in time react on the prosperity of his railroads.

Mr. President, I have spoken more at length on the effect of this measure on the prices of the products that North Dakota produces than on those of the products of other States, not necessarily because the first are the more important, but because I am somewhat familiar with the conditions of farming in my own State, know that the farmers have not been unduly prosperous, and believe that there is reason for their apprehension as to the effects of this measure. I should, however, oppose a measure of this kind even if the products of my own State were not involved, as no good can come to any nation from the perpetration of an injustice to one class or those engaged in one industry, especially when that industry is as fundamental to the welfare of the nation as agriculture. I may have erroneous ideas as to what has in the past been understood as reciprocity, and yet when I read the statements of the men who were the sponsors for this policy in the days past I can not conceive how this measure can with any show of reason be called a reciprocity measure. Mr. Blaine, for instance, said in regard to the former reciprocity treaty with Canada:

> The selection, as shown by the schedule, was made almost wholly to favor Canadian interests. There was scarcely a product in the list which could be exported from the United States to Canada without loss, while the great market of the United States was thrown open to Canada without tax or charge for nearly everything which she could produce and export. All her raw materials were admitted free, while our manufactures were charged with heavy duty, the market being reserved for English merchants. The fishery question had been adroitly used to secure from the United States an agreement which was one-sided, vexatious, and unprofitable.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator leaves the reference to Mr. Blaine—I have been called out of the Chamber part of the time, and I should like to ask the Senator whether in his speech he has referred to the speech which Mr. Blaine made against the whole system of reciprocity in competitive articles? If he has not, I should like to submit as a part of the Senator's remarks an extract from that speech.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say that I have not referred to it.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, I should like, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, to submit an extract from a speech made by Mr. Blaine in 1874. It is true that in Mr. Blaine's later years he did advocate reciprocity in noncompetitive articles, but not in competitive articles. Mr. Blaine said:

> [Extract from speech of Hon. J. G. Blaine, June 20, 1874, p. 124, "Political Discussions."]
> Against the whole policy of adjusting revenue questions by the treaty-making power, I desire to enter on behalf of my constituents an emphatic protest. The Constitution gives to the House of Representatives the sole and exclusive right to originate bills of revenue, and this great power should be kept where it can be controlled by the direct and unbiased vote of the people. It may well be that sundry articles of Canadian product should be admitted free or with diminished duty; it may well be also that Canada would find it advantageous to admit certain articles from us free of duty. Let each country decide the question for itself, and avoid the "logrolling" feature of a treaty in which it will inevitably—> happen that certain interests will be sacrificed in order that others may be promoted. Let us simply place Canada on the same basis with other foreign countries, taxing her products or admitting them free, according to our own judgment of the interest of our own revenue and the pursuits and needs of our own people, always bearing in mind that in government as in family matters "charity begins at home," and that "he who provideth not for those of his own house is worse than an infidel."

This applies with complete force to the present situation—

I submit this to the Senator as an answer to the claim of the President that this bill is in harmony with the attitude and position of Mr. Blaine upon this question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Minnesota for submitting this valuable quotation.

President McKinley in his last public speech, at Buffalo, in September, 1901, said:

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production, we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. * * * We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to industry and labor. * * * What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and production, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

The Republican platform of 1900 contained the following declaration:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

The Republican platform of 1904 says:

We have extended widely our foreign markets, and we believe in the adoption of all practicable methods for their further extension, including commercial reciprocity wherever reciprocal arrangements can be effected consistent with the principles of protection and without injury to American agriculture, American labor, or any American industry.

The Republican platform of 1908, on which President Taft was elected, contained no declaration in favor of reciprocity, and the farmers who supported the Republican candidate certainly had no reason to believe that they were to be singled out for an attack by a Republican administration.

The reciprocity agreements which have been entered into by former Republican administrations have been confined to noncompetitive products, admitting products which we do not produce ourselves free of duty, and securing in return for this concession the free admission of some of our products to other countries. The only reciprocal feature discernible in the pending measure is between the Canadian farmer and the railroads and some of the manufacturing interests in this country. The Canadian grain grower and the American millers, packers, and railroads all expect to reap some gain from this pact. The American farmer and the American consumer will reap no gain. I would rather have reciprocity between the farm and the factory in this country than between the farm in Canada and the factory and railroads in this country.

Mr. President, it has been intimated here and elsewhere that this bill can not be amended, that it must be passed in its present form or not at all, and the reason given is not that Canada in that event would refuse to pass the bill now pending before its Parliament, thus causing the agreement to fail, but that it would prevent this measure from becoming law by reason of its failure to receive the required sanction elsewhere. So far as the fear of the President's using his veto power is concerned, I will say that I do not believe that anyone has been authorized by him to state that the bill will be vetoed if changed in any manner, and I am frank to say that I believe that the pending measure can be greatly changed without its resulting in failure to receive the President's sanction. It is within the memory of some of us how a railroad bill came to us fresh from the drafting room of the Executive offices with the ultimatum, according to newspaper reports, that if it were materially changed the President would feel it incumbent on him to use his veto power. The two Houses of Congress took the bill in hand, and by radically changing it—in fact, reversing its effects, if not its purpose—presented to the President a bill embodying the views of a majority in Congress. Was this bill as thus passed met with a veto? Far from it. The President immediately approved the bill, and has since been proud to claim its passage as one of the achievements of his administration. I may be pardoned for stating that I do not believe that the President will refuse his approval of this bill if the Senate should see fit to amend it.

The other body of this Congress has, in the report of the Ways and Means Committee on the free-list bill, admitted that the Canadian reciprocity measure standing alone works an injustice to the farmer, and has passed the free-list bill in an avowed attempt to remove some of this injustice. I confess I can not see why anyone should believe that the inclusion of some of the provisions of that bill in this measure should prevent its being agreed to by the House. Surely, if it is desirable to pass a bill to remedy some of the injustices which another measure will work, it ought to be desirable to amend the measure so as to effect the same purpose.

If, however, the Senate should decide that it is not advisable to amend this bill, I believe it would be well to consider and take action on the free-list bill, the woolen bill, and other general tariff bills which we understand are coming over from the House before taking final action on the pending measure. It has been intimated that those bills are in danger of being vetoed if passed by the Senate. While I do not believe that anyone has been authorized to make such a statement, I believe it would be well to know whether or not the other bills will become laws before taking the final vote on the pending measure. It is possible that there are Senators whose attitude toward this bill, especially in the matter of amending it, would be influenced by the knowledge that the free-list, woolen, and other bills would or would not become laws. I believe it is only fair to those Senators and also to the President to dispose of the other bills first. It is well known that the President is anxious to secure the passage of this bill, but I do not believe that he wants to suffer under the belief which certain individuals have tried to foster that he will use the fate of the other bills to secure support for his pet measure. Neither do I believe that Senators who favor this measure and who also favor the other bills want to labor under the suspicion, which has been aroused in certain quarters, that they are not sincere in their support of the free-list and other bills, and that they have not been offered with the expectation of their becoming laws.

A further consideration which, it appears to me, carries some weight is the fact that the other bills are general tariff bills applying to all countries and will determine the general level of tariff duties levied. The justice, wisdom, and desirability of trade agreements granting special rates to one country naturally depend largely on the general level of duties against the products of other countries. If we pass those other bills, or refuse to pass them, we will then know what the general tariff rates will be and what concessions we are asked to grant to Canada in the matter of tariff rates. It is manifestly impossible to determine whether the placing of an article from one country on the free list is a concession until we know whether the general tariff law places that article on the free list.

It is impossible to know whether the tariff rate granted one country is a concession until we know whether the tariff rate applying to the products of other countries is higher or lower than the special tariff rate. So long as we do not know whether or not those other bills will become laws or what rates of duty they will carry in their final form, we are working in the dark so far as Canadian agreement is concerned. It is possible that if we pass the Canadian reciprocity bill and later pass other measures, we shall find that the duties carried by them in their final form are lower than the special rates we grant Canada. If this should cause the Canadians to question our good faith in entering into this agreement, it certainly would not operate to bind us with any closer ties to that country. Regardless of whether we favor or are opposed to the reciprocity measure, I believe it would be far better to consider and act on the free list and woolen bills, which are now before the Senate, and such other bills as are coming over from the House, before taking final action on this measure, than to proceed with this bill while in the dark as to what the general tariff rates will be three or four months from now.

Mr. President, in its present form the pending measure is not deserving of the name reciprocity. It surrenders the market of the American farmer without any recompense. Retaining the protection of the manufactured products it will not, as has been pretended, reduce the cost of living to the consumer. Offered and granted such special privileges in the matter of trade as are not enjoyed by any other country—not even Cuba or the Philippines—Canada grants the United States no privileges in the matter of trade which she is not willing, and compelled, to grant to all other favored-nation countries, with England enjoying a preference wherever the article is not placed on the free list. We are asked to make this gratuitous gift to a foreign country, which, no matter how friendly it may be, is a part of the empire built up by our greatest commercial rival.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. In connection with the suggestion of the Senator in regard to the preferential duty which is granted to England, if the Senator will pardon the suggestion, I think that there ought to be made in his speech a reference to an attempt on the part of the administration to lead the American people to believe that there are no preferentials now granted to Great Britain. I call the Senator's attention to a speech made by the Secretary of State, the Hon. Philander C. Knox, in Chicago on the 15th of February, 1911, in which he said:

Trade between the United States and the British Provinces was, up to 1845, burdened with a system of differential duties which discriminated against foreign importations into Canada in favor of the British. In 1845 the British Government authorized the Canadian Legislature to regulate its own tariff. Canada, now autonomous as to tariffs, generously and almost at once removed the existing differential duties and admitted American goods on the same terms as those imported from Great Britain. This change gave a great impetus to importations from the United States.

That is the end of the quotation. That expression going to the American people from the Secretary of State would carry to the minds of those who are not familiar with the history of Canadian legislation the idea that the discriminations removed in 1845 had never been restored, when the fact is that they were restored, are now in force, and will remain in force under this Canadian reciprocity bill.

I desire to suggest to the Senator, if he will pardon me, the importance of putting this in his speech, because it will go to thousands of readers and not only call attention to the misrepresentation, but show the existence of a preferential duty in favor of Great Britain.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say, in reply to the Senator from Minnesota, that I have submitted a statement making a comparison of the British preferential rates and the reciprocal rates extended to the United States, showing that Great Britain has a preferential rate.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but has the Senator made that in connection with this statement of the Secretary of State?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I have not.

Mr. CLAPP. A reader of the Senator's speech might have read this statement of the Secretary of State, and unless attention is called to it, and specifically denied, recognized as a statement that should be denied, the reader might perhaps come to the conclusion that the Senator had overlooked this. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the two ought to go together.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator for the suggestion, and I shall put it in my remarks in connection with the statement comparing the tariffs between the two countries.

Mr. CLAPP. That was the idea.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that we should try to extend our foreign markets by reasonable tariff arrangements, including reciprocity treaties, wherever we can do so without doing injustice or injury to industries in our own country, but I do not believe in the unconditional surrender of American markets without recompense, as this agreement effects. There are countries with which reciprocity treaties could be made which would benefit us as well as them. There are countries which produce goods which we need and have to buy, and which need to buy such products as we have to sell. Wisely drawn agreements with such countries would have my support, but I can not support an agreement which sacrifices the interests of the American farmer in order that the Canadian farmer, the railroads, the millers, the packers, and the brewing interests may be benefited.

Mr. THORNTON obtained the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. THORNTON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Smoot
Bailey	Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Stone
Bourne	Cullom	Lippitt	Sutherland
Bradley	Cummins	McCumber	Swanson
Brandegee	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Taylor
Bristow	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Thornton
Brown	du Pont	Overman	Warren
Bryan	Foster	Page	Watson
Burnham	Gore	Perkins	Wetmore
Burton	Gronna	Pomerene	Williams
Chamberlain	Guggenheim	Root	Works
Chilton	Heyburn	Shively
Clapp	Hitchcock	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, at the outset of my remarks I wish to express to my Democratic brethren my deep regret at the fact that I can not stand on this proposition where the great majority of them stand, for if I considered my personal feelings alone, it would be far more agreeable to me to vote with them on every matter than against them on any.

Yet I am sure they will accord to me the same liberty of opinion and right of expression of that opinion as I so fully accord to them.

Nor do I believe that if I acted on a question contrary to the dictates of my conscience they could have much respect for me, and I certainly could have none for myself.

On the day the Root amendment to the Canadian reciprocity bill was voted on I took occasion to very briefly state to the Senate my reasons for opposing the bill while supporting the amendment, these reasons being that in my opinion the bill was unjust to the agricultural interests of some sections of the country and the amendment was intended to render it a little less unjust in the particular feature toward which it was directed.

I wish now to present more fully the reasons why I can not support the bill in its present shape consistently with the professions I made to the people of Louisiana at the time of my election, or with my sense of right and justice, or with what I deem was the obligation I assumed to the people of the United States when I took the oath of office as a Member of this body.

In order to show that I can not support this bill in its present shape and be consistent with my previous public professions to the people of my State, I must be pardoned for stating them here.

During the month of December last the candidates for the Senate, including myself, were invited by the General Assembly of Louisiana to address that body and state their positions on matters pertaining to national policies among others.

And my views were given in an address to the General Assembly delivered on the evening preceding my election and reiterated on the day following it while expressing my thanks for the high honor conferred on me.

On the tariff question, with which this Canadian reciprocity agreement is so intimately connected, I said that the Republican Party, under the claim of fostering home industries, had imposed a duty on many manufactured articles in excess of what was necessary for their protection, with the resultant effect of unduly increasing the profits of the manufacturers at the expense of the consumers, and that in all the efforts of my party to better this condition I would assist.

I said it was the agriculturists who bore the brunt of the tariff on the manufactured articles they must use, and that if a tariff for protection along any lines could be justified, the agriculturists were entitled to its benefits.

I said that I never had been and, unless my present views changed, never expected to be an advocate of a protective tariff in the sense that term was generally understood as a doctrine of the Republican Party.

I said it was idle to talk about free trade, because that could not be a practical question under existing circumstances.

I said that in order to meet the expenses of the Government it was necessary to levy import duties as a source of revenue, and as tariff duties must be levied and as the agriculturists of the United States generally received less of the benefits and more of the burdens of the protective-tariff system than any other class of our people, I believed that wherever duties could be levied that would help those who followed agriculture for a livelihood, they should be levied.

I said that I considered the tariff question to be a most intricate one on account of the diverse conditions existing in a country of such great area and varied productions and industries as our own, and they who felt it to be an easy question readily solved by themselves, possessed mental capacities far superior to my own.

I said further that the longer I lived and studied existing conditions, the more satisfied I became that the tariff question, with all its complex problems, should not be made a partisan political question, but its differences should be adjusted through the aid of a nonpartisan board, so that tariff bills could be framed along scientific and business instead of political lines.

These are substantially the views on this subject I expressed to the General Assembly of Louisiana in the most perfect good faith, for otherwise, of course, they could not have been expressed, and I took my seat in this body last December fully imbued with their spirit, and considering their expression in the nature of pledges which must necessarily be redeemed whenever the occasion demanded.

It was in the closing days of the last Congress that I was put to the first test when the vote on the creation of the permanent Tariff Board was taken, and I was one of the five Democratic Senators voting for the act.

I regretted to differ on that question with the great majority of my Democratic brethren, as I regret to differ with them on the present question, yet I had no alternative, because I was fully convinced that such a board, created out of the proper material, would greatly facilitate the work of the Congress along tariff lines; and the high character of the President of the United States was to me, at least, a guaranty that he would appoint a capable and nonpartisan board that would give faithful and impartial research and findings, the final result being that this great tariff question would cease to be the football of politics, as it were, even though at the expense to the country of removing some arrows from the quivers of some of the blatant demagogues of both political parties.

And the second demand on me to prove my faith by my works came with the advent of this Canadian agreement.

My duty in this case is so plain to me that I can not for a moment hesitate to both voice and vote my opposition to the bill.

To do otherwise would not only force me to violate the solemn professions I made to the General Assembly of Louisiana both before and after my election, but also my sense of right and justice and the obligation of my oath as a Senator of the United States, as I understand that obligation.

I did not come here as the self-constituted champion of the agriculturists of this country, and I am not posing now as such.

Yet I claim that they should be fairly treated, and I do not hesitate to say that not only should no discrimination be made against them in any tariff law, but, if discriminations must be made in favor of any class, they are more entitled to receive it than any other class.

For after all is said it still remains true that agriculture is the foundation stone of the prosperity of this country, the removal of which would cause the superstructure of commercial greatness, which has been built up at such vast expense, to topple over in ruins.

For I believe the American farm can do without the factory better than the American factory can do without the farm.

I would not willingly do harm to either, for I do not wish to see a single industry of my country that is assisting in her development and giving work to her citizens destroyed; but if I had to choose, the factory would die and the farm would live.

And the feeling I have for the cultivators of the soil is in the blood also, for I am sprung from a race of agriculturists, was born and raised to manhood on a farm, what time I was not in the Civil War, and followed agriculture for a livelihood for 10 years after its close; a farmer in fact as well as in name, I can say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], walking between the plow handles and enriching with the sweat of my toil the fields formerly tilled by my father's slaves.

And so my sympathy for the cultivators of the soil comes very naturally, having undergone with them a common experience, and I can not but resist the enactment of a law which discriminates against them as directly as this bill does.

That discrimination, as has been said so often during this debate, consists in removing the import duty from what they must sell while retaining it on what they must buy, not only for the cultivation of their farms but for the necessities as well as the comforts of their families, forcing them to sell in a free while buying in a protected market.

And that is why I told the people of my State, through a published interview when I went home in March, that I could not support the bill; and I told them, moreover, then what I repeat now, that the fact that the bill did not injure a single agricultural product of my State could not for a moment operate to prevent me from opposing it, because I stood for the agricultural interests of every section of this country—North, South, East, and West.

And I say here and now that the interests of the wheat and oat and barley growers of the northwestern border States and of the dairy producers of New York and Vermont will receive from me the same consideration that I would extend to the agricultural interests of Louisiana or any Southern State, for if I am a Southerner and a Louisianian I am also an American; and while it is true that in one sense I represent the people of Louisiana particularly, it is also true that in another sense I represent the people of the United States generally, and that is why I feel that I can not support this bill without impairing the obligation of my oath as a Senator of the United States.

Now, I do not know the extent of the injury these citizens of the United States will receive through the operation of this agreement, and I do not think its extent can be accurately approximated by anyone; but it seems clear to me that they will receive some injury, and it is not fair or right that they should receive any.

And even if it was a doubtful proposition, I contend that it is wrong to make the experiment at their expense, for if it should diminish the price of their agricultural and dairy products through this foreign competition, the money they will have lost will never be repaid to them from any source, for the Government of their country that caused them to lose will never make that loss good to them.

Two things stand out plainly to me in this connection. One is that as long as import duties are levied for the benefit of manufacturers, who can be helped thereby, just that long they should be levied for the benefit of agriculturists, who can be helped thereby.

And I confess that the statement of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], made on this floor recently, that if these farmers were helped by this duty to the extent of its imposition, he wished the duty removed so that they could not profit by it, had to me a very hard and cruel sound, not in accordance with what I had conceived to be his kindly nature; and I wondered if the State of Nevada was as rich in soil as she is in rocks, and settled thickly by an industrious farming population, he would feel the same way about it.

And the other thing that stands out plainly to me is the fact that these buncoed farmers, if I may be pardoned for using a slang expression for the reason that it best describes their situation, will continue to pay the same prices they now pay for the manufactured articles they need.

I consider this agreement to be absolutely unjustifiable for the reasons I have given.

Yet as much as I condemn it I wish it to be very distinctly understood that I do not for a moment question the perfect sincerity of the President of the United States in proclaiming his belief that this measure will not hurt the farming elements of the border States, but, on the contrary, benefit them along with all other classes of our people.

In fact, I feel absolutely sure that I, who denounce his pet measure as wrong and unjust, feel for him a far higher personal regard than do at least nine-tenths of the Democratic Senators who applaud the measure as being wise and beneficent.

I feel assured that his big heart throbs for all the people of his country and that he would not willfully injure any class among them; but this does not prevent me from believing and saying, with the utmost respect, that in this matter his head is as wrong as his heart is right.

The feeling that the cost of living had become unduly high was responsible for the defeat of the Republican Party in the elections of last fall, and something had to be done to counteract the feeling if possible, and it was claimed that this agreement would reduce the cost of living through the free admission of the agricultural products of Canada, though how the admission of these agricultural and dairy products into the United States free of duty can have any effect on the general cost of living in this country I can not see, though I can see how it will diminish more or less the profits of the farmers of the border States.

And with all respect, it seems to me that this claim of reducing the cost of living through this bill is farcical, though the effect of the measure as to the farmers of the United States living in the States adjacent to the border may be tragical.

Nevertheless it is the accepted theory that it will reduce the cost of living through cheaper food that gains for it the general support of the manufacturing industries and residents of cities.

I do not believe that the price the farmer receives for his raw material is responsible for the high cost of living. He does not receive a high price for his products, and if the consumer pays a high price for them in their finished state it is due to other causes than the price paid to the farmer, who not only does not receive the benefit of the enhanced price, but has to pay that enhanced price for what he must use of the finished product of his own raw material.

It has been shown more than once during the progress of this debate that the placing of hides on the free list did not reduce the price of shoes, and therefore the result has been that the American farmers and cattle raisers have lost a few million dollars' profit and the American Government a few million dollars of revenue, while the American public has not saved a dollar through a reduction in the price of shoes.

It must be that the manufacturers have been able to regulate the selling price in some manner.

And under these circumstances I should like to see the duty on hides restored, so that the farmers could again receive the profit and the Government the revenue; and the public saved from monopoly by reducing the duty on shoes.

And just as it has been with free hides, so do I fear it would be with free wool; the farmer losing the profit and the Government the revenue and the public paying as much as ever for woolen goods, the price of which would be maintained in the same way the price of shoes has been maintained; and the remedy being the same, a reduction of the duty on woolen fabrics so that a monopoly in their sale could not be created and maintained.

I do not believe that the operation of this agreement which admits free cattle and wheat and oats into this country would result in cheaper meat from the packers or cheaper flour from the millers or cheaper bread from the bakers or cheaper cereal preparations from the manufacturers of such.

I think that relief from the high cost of living will not be reached by removing the duty from farm products, but by reducing the duty on manufactured articles; and so I believe that this Canadian agreement, while injuring the agriculturists, will not reduce the general cost of living. I said privately here during the session of the last Congress that if the agriculturists could be compensated for the removal of the duty from their products by the lowering of the duties on manufactured articles, I could support the bill; and I said so publicly when I went home in March.

When the Congress reconvened for the extra session, it was announced that the House of Representatives would pass the free-list bill before it passed the Canadian bill; and I at once announced that this arrangement would enable me to vote for the Canadian bill; and I was happy, too, in the thought that then I could stand with the great majority of my Democratic brethren in this body, for I would so much rather stand with them than against them.

But the program was changed, through the promise of the President it was said, that if the House would pass his Canadian bill first, he would not dissolve the Congress after the Senate passed it, but allow the House to pass and send up tariff revision bills, though, of course, giving no promise that such bills would receive his countenance.

And so the program was changed, and it was decided to pass the reciprocity bill first and the free-list bill afterwards, and then all my hopes were dashed.

For I knew what both the House and the Senate knew, that the reciprocity bill would pass the Senate and become a law, while the free-list bill, dubbed by its authors the "farmers' free-list bill" because of the idea that it would compensate them for the injury they would receive from the operation of the reciprocity bill, could never pass the Senate and become a law, thus, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] recently said in the debate on this floor, making to the farmers "a promise to the ear, but breaking it to the hope."

Now, I stand here and maintain that if the free-list bill or some bill of a similar nature can not become a law at this session, then, in justice to the farmers of the border States, this reciprocity bill should not become a law at this session.

In consideration of the fact of the discrimination of the bill against the agricultural interests of the country, coupled with the lack of advantages to the United States generally, I can not believe the favor it is receiving in the country would be as general if it had not been created and fostered by the powerful influence of the press of this country.

It is an undeniable fact that through the free print-paper provisions of the bill the newspaper and magazine proprietors of the United States will receive a greater pecuniary benefit from its passage than any other class of our people.

I do not charge that this is the reason for the energetic support the great majority of them, outside of the agricultural press, are giving to the bill, but I do charge that without that support the bill would have no general public standing.

It may be that they honestly think its passage is for the general good; and if they say so, I will not question their sincerity.

But it is natural that men should be biased in the direction of their personal interests, perhaps unconsciously at times, and their sense of justice dulled thereby; and the spectacle of the press of both political parties agreeing with practical unanimity on this measure might strike an outsider as a little singular and somewhat unusual.

But the newspapers expect to be large beneficiaries under the bill; and, therefore, it does not seem surprising that when the President of the United States was advocating its passage before the Newspaper Publishers' Association in the city of New York his remarks were received, according to the newspaper statements, with "tumultuous applause," for the President was addressing a stocked jury, as it were, with minds made up before hearing either evidence or argument.

Nor is it surprising to read lately that in the poll of newspapers, taken to show the feeling of the country toward the bill, the vote would always be three or four to one in favor of it, for that was also appealing to a stocked jury with minds already made up; and I do not say they were not honestly made up, but, as I have already said, there was the danger of bias, consciously or unconsciously, through self-interest.

You might just as well take a poll of the protected manufacturers of this country on the question as to whether a tariff bill carrying high protection for their special products was of general benefit to the country.

I think there would be a great unanimity of opinion in favor of the proposition that such a bill was a good one, and they might be honest, too, in their opinion, for I hope I may never become so narrow as to refuse to accept the sincerity of others on a question simply because their views on it were opposed to my own. Yet, still, I think I could legitimately charge that it was another case of a stocked jury.

But the press is urging the passage of the bill, and who shall deny the mighty influence of the press of this country.

Some Members of this body may remember how last December a very new addition to the Senate, and who has since been subtracted from it, himself a newspaper editor, in an address on this floor very broadly intimated that it was the press and not the Congress of the country that enacted its laws.

I of course can not admit the correctness of the statement. Still I believe the press often assists in the molding of the opinion of public men to a greater extent than they may be aware of.

Speaking for myself, if I even halfway know myself, my attitude on public questions will be determined by my conception of right, uninfluenced by either the desire to receive the plaudits of the press or the fear of receiving its censure.

I do not for a moment intimate that anyone else could be thus influenced; I only claim that I can not be.

And I can say that I believe, generally speaking, the influence of the press is for good on public men and public measures and its legitimate censorship an aid to both private and public morals.

No public man can reasonably object to criticism of his judgment on public matters by either the press or individuals, but he has the right to object to criticism of his motives when he knows his motives are honest.

And some of the ardent newspaper advocates of this bill have exceeded the bounds of legitimate criticism of Senators who are opponents of it, for they have gone so far as to impugn their motives and charge them with insincerity, thus reflecting on their personal honor.

I can not admit that any Senator would either advocate or oppose this bill from insincere motives; and, speaking for myself alone, I wish to say that any newspaper statement that may have been previously published or that may be hereafter published, charging or intimating that my opposition to this bill is not genuine or that I was not sincere in the expression of my motives for my opposition to it, is false.

But the newspapers will get their wish in this matter, for the bill will be passed by the Senate and approved by the President and go into operation; and then I will wait with some interest to see whether free print paper will cause a reduction in the price of advertisements, the great source of revenue to newspapers and magazines; and I shall hope that free paper will help the patrons of advertising columns more than free hides seem to have helped the wearers of shoes.

I know the people of the cities favor this bill under the idea that it will give them cheaper food products. I do not believe it will; but if I was sure that it would, I deny that they should have cheaper living through a reduction of the price of foodstuffs unless the agriculturists have at the same time cheaper living through a reduction of the price of manufactured goods.

A recent illustration of the city feeling on this subject is the resolution of the commercial bodies of Milwaukee approving Canadian reciprocity; and I shall try to learn hereafter, through the experience of others, whether cheaper malt will cheapen the price to its thirsty imbibers in this country of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous."

It should be thoroughly understood that my opposition to the bill is based on the opinion that through its provisions the agriculturists of a part of this country are unfairly discriminated against.

I am not concerned with its danger to the protective-tariff system of the country established and maintained by the Republican Party as are those Republican opponents of the bill who have preceded me in the debate, because I have not been a subscriber to that system, but a subscriber to the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue.

I admit the perfect sincerity of the advocates of the Republican doctrine, and I think I fully understand their position, but do not consider it justified by results.

Briefly stated, the theory is that in order to assist the upbuilding of our manufacturing industries we should levy an import duty on articles of foreign make, thus enabling our own manufacturers to pay their workmen higher wages than they could otherwise pay, enabling them to live comfortably, the final result being that while the scale of wages would be maintained, the scale of prices for the manufactured products would be gradually lowered through home competition.

This sounds well in theory and appeals to pride and patriotism, but it has not worked out in practice; for if wages are kept up, I think the fact is due rather to the organized efforts of the employees than to the benevolence of the employers; and, so far as the reduction of prices through competition is concerned, we have seen that they are not only maintained but often increased through the joinder of interests, thus stifling competition; and there is a well-grounded suspicion that some of the tariff schedules of late years have been dictated by the manufacturers.

I have previously said that the agriculturists have not generally had a fair share in this protective tariff business, because they bore all the burdens of it that others did while receiving fewer of the benefits.

I know the position of the Republican protectionist on that question, too, which is that manufacturing industries build up cities, affording thereby a better market to the farmer. That may be true to a certain extent, and farmers contiguous to cities have a more profitable sale for their surplus truck; and it may be that sometimes farmers have grown rich by increase of the value of their lands due to the growth of industrial cities, as in the instance of our farmer Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], assuming the correctness of the statements made on this floor by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I deny the impeachment, most respectfully.

Mr. THORNTON. I did not understand whether the Senator said anything that calls for an answer.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Not necessarily. I simply said that I deny the impeachment of having grown rich or of being rich.

Mr. THORNTON. I am sorry the Senator is under the necessity to make a denial. I wish the imputation were true. But I think the general situation is, as I have stated, that the manufacturer has generally had greater advantages than the farmer under the protective tariff system.

Of course no theory that did not present on its face the appearance of plausibility could have so long commanded the support of the majority of the American people as the Republican protective theory has commanded it, but experience sometimes shatters theories.

And so with the tariff theory of the Democratic Party having as its underlying basis the great principle of equal rights and opportunities to all.

The rules within which the Democratic theory are supposed to be embraced are few and, on their face, perfectly sound, in my opinion, but while foolish men may be able to repeat them, only wise men can apply them properly in such a country as this.

It comes back to the proposition that the tarfff is a most complex problem, as they who attempt to frame a tariff law undoubtedly discover.

But a protective tariff should be impartial in its application and not discriminate against the food producers, as this bill does.

During the debate on this question, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] said he favored entire free trade with Canada; and I claim that this would be infinitely fairer to the farming element than is the present bill; for that would allow the farmers, in common with all other classes, to buy some very necessary things at a much cheaper price than now—clothing and cotton and woolen goods, I understand, being about one-third cheaper in Canada than in the United States.

There was an attempt made at one time by the reciprocity press to belittle the opposition of the farmers of the border States to this bill, but the attempt had to be abandoned under the facts as shown.

And an effort has also been made on this floor to show that antagonism to this bill existed in Canada also, and therefore some people there did not think Canada was getting the advantage.

There is a certain amount of opposition in Canada, coming from the political party there in the opposition, and there is a feeling that the agreement may be injurious to England; but this opposition seems confined to Provinces like Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Ontario, the latter having an intense feeling of loyalty toward the "mother country."

At Weyburn, in the Province of Saskatchewan, according to the press dispatches, the Canadian farmers passed resolutions that they would make the Province secede from the Dominion if the agreement was not ratified; and at Moose Jaw, in that Province, the same intense feeling is reported, and a Washington paper that strongly advocates the bill, commenting editorially on these occurrences, says:

> Obviously, reciprocity is sweeping through Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, from Rat Portage to Medicine Hat, like a prairie fire.

And why should it not? These Canadian farmers know the advantages to them of having a free outlet into the United States for their surplus agricultural products; and no one in this Chamber will deny that the opportunity to thus dispose of her surplus agricultural products was the moving consideration with Canada in this matter, and that without the stipulation for free trade in those products she would not for a moment have considered the agreement.

She would not entertain the proposition for free trade in manufactured articles.

I do not believe this Canadian bill is well understood by the farmers of the country at large. I believe if they did understand it, generally, they would in all sections of this country demand that justice should be shown to their class.

I do not believe that the southern farmers, although they can not be hurt by this treaty, at least for many years to come—not until she becomes, as she is destined to become in the next 50 years at the outside, the greatest food-producing section of the United States—would countenance it if they understood it, for I know they are a warm-hearted and fair-minded class of people; but it is not called generally to their attention, except through newspapers interested in its passage.

I think that not only their sense of justice but policy as well, should make the agriculturists of this entire country stand together on this question, for there is need through present appearances for them to thoroughly organize, not to seek advantages over other classes but to see that advantages are not taken over them; and when they do so, even if their vote is not as great as the combined vote of other classes, it is great enough to cause their wishes to receive great consideration in the Congress of the United States.

But they are not united now, and this bill will pass the Senate through the combined votes of strict Democrats and stalwart Republicans, the latter voting for it because of their reluctance to oppose this Republican administration measure—for that is what it is and nothing else—and the Democrats voting for it for what I do not know, but for reasons that are doubtless proper and sufficient unto them, and which, I presume, will be given on the floor during the debate.

So far the only reasons I have heard advanced by them publicly or privately were that the bill was "a step in the right direction," was a good political move in the way of changing Republican farmers to Democrats, or would interject strife and dissension into the Republican Party, the last theory being lately advanced in a published interview by the talented and fearless leader of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives, my previous high respect for whom has been lately enhanced by his refusal to permit the judgment of his committee to be coerced by outside interference.

And I see that in the published report of his recent speech at Providence, R. I., the President has adopted this Democratic reason by saying that Democrats should support the bill because it was "a step in the right direction."

In the direction of what? Democrats have claimed that the step leads toward free trade, toward conversion of Republicans to Democrats, and toward dissension in the Republican Party; but I hardly think the President, who is the head of the Republican Party in this country, will claim that any of these steps are in the "right direction."

I have yet to learn that free trade is an authorized doctrine of the Democratic Party, though I am aware it is favored by some or many Democrats.

But I deny that there is any Democratic principle in this bill. It could never have been framed by any Democratic committee, for no bill that combines free trade for agriculturists with protection for manufacturers could possibly be Democratic. It violates the great Democratic principle of equality, and I utterly repudiate the statement of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] that this is a Democratic measure. It most distinctly is not, and the fact that a majority of Democrats in both Houses of this Congress will vote for it for various reasons can not make it a Democratic measure.

Now, so far as the political expediency of the matter is concerned, every Democrat here is necessarily the judge of his own conscience, and I have neither the right nor the wish to judge him in that respect.

But, speaking for myself alone, I can say that I have never subscribed to the doctrine that the end justifies the means, and have never knowingly practiced it, and I am too old to begin the practice now.

I shall vote in accordance with my conviction of right and without reference to the question of injury to a political opponent.

It has been now more than a month ago that a very valued friend in north Louisiana, one who heard my address to the general assembly of that State, being himself one of its most useful and honored members, and one of that body who honored me with his support, and who had read my published interview in March, previously alluded to, on this reciprocity bill, wrote to me that, while he would vote for it if he could, yet, knowing the position I had taken before the legislature that elected me with reference to the agriculturists of the country, he thought I should oppose the bill; and he added that he recognized the unfairness of passing the bill unless the farmers' free-list bill could be passed and become a law at the same time, yet that in politics sometimes the end might justify the means, and the passage of this bill would probably make good Democrats out of these Republican farmers; and then, after saying that some of my people might question my judgment, he added this message, the reading of which, I am not ashamed to say, dimmed my eyes while rejoicing my heart:

Again I wish to assure you that the people of Louisiana are sure of your sincerity of purpose in acting in this matter as you have done, and honor you for the courage of your convictions.

I can not see how the passage of this bill under existing circumstances should make Democrats out of Republican farmers, for a majority of the Republicans in the House voted against it, and it was carried there by the large Democratic majority given it, and here a majority of the Republicans will vote against it, and it will be carried by the large Democratic majority voting with the stalwart Republicans who have been unable to resist the presidential pressure.

I believe the Democratic Party can not gain recruits from Republican farmers in this way, but could gain them by uniting with the progressive Republicans of this body to see that the Canadian bill does not pass unless at this same session a tariff-revision bill passes; and I believe that in pursuing such a course justice and good policy would go hand in hand together.

But it seems useless to hope for this, for the Canadian reciprocity bill will pass without an amendment that would relieve any of its injustice, just in the shape the President says he wishes it passed—"the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill"—while the tariff bills of the Democratic House will not pass, and would not be approved if they did.

There are some grating things about this matter to me. Not long since the leading evening newspaper of this city, a paper continually exhorting the Democrats of this body to vote for reciprocity, contained an editorial saying that this measure was the only one that would pass the Senate, and the tariff bills already passed by the House—alluding to the free list and woolen bills—were only "popgun measures" and "plays to the galleries," and the Democratic Senators should stand by reciprocity and see it pass.

I confess that such talk from such a source is not pleasant to me as a Democrat, and it is somewhat trying, too, from my knowledge that the great majority of the Democratic Senators will do as this paper says they should do about the reciprocity bill and then be patted on the back by it for doing it, and then sneered at afterwards for trying to pass honest reform bills sent them by a Democratic House.

The editor has an undoubted right to form and express his opinions on the matter, but I do not feel called on to follow his advice, for I am neither a Republican nor high protectionist, while, judged by his utterances, he is evidently both.

These Democratic measures will not become laws, but the Canadian bill will become a law, and the farmers will be hurt and the protected manufacturers left unhurt.

To me there is a great principle at stake in this matter, and for one I will never be a party to such an act of injustice, and I can answer, too, to the people of my State for my action.

At the risk of appearing egotistical, I say here that I am confident that at least nine-tenths of the people of Louisiana will believe in the sincerity of my position on this subject and that at least two-thirds of them will approve of my judgment on it.

And if the farmers of this country, who more than any other class of its citizens have added to its glory and greatness, shall be injured by this act of their Government, they shall never be able to say that I assisted in what the leonine Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] recently called on this floor "the infamy of this legislation."

Since this address was prepared President Taft has stated, in a speech delivered at Indianapolis three days ago, that in his judgment the reciprocity bill would not diminish the cost of living; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in an address to the Senate two days ago advocating the passage of the bill, said it would be unwise to hold out the hope that it would accomplish any material change in the cost of living. I have devoted some space in my address toward trying to show that the bill would not reduce the cost of living. The country has generally understood that the principal advantage claimed for the United States would be the reduction of the cost of living, and the reciprocity press has steadily urged that fact as an inducement to its support.

If it is now admitted that it will have no such effect, the only plausibly meritorious claim for its enactment is withdrawn, and there is in my opinion no excuse for its support.

IMPROVEMENT OF RURAL-DELIVERY ROADS.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, availing myself of the custom of the Senate, several days ago I gave notice that after the conclusion of the speech of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] I would make some remarks on a bill I have introduced, being Senate bill 2935, relative to national aid for the improvement and construction of post roads. I request that that bill be now temporarily laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill referred to by the Senator from Virginia, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2935) to provide for the construction, maintenance, and improvement of post roads and rural-delivery routes through the cooperation and joint action of the National Government and the several States in which such post roads or rural-delivery routes may be established.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there is no question before the American people to-day more important than the improvement of the public roads and highways. The progress of this Nation in nearly all directions has been phenomenal. We have established our preeminence in most things. We have become the greatest manufacturing people in the world, the products of our factories exceeding those of Britain and Continental Europe combined. Our mines furnish the world more than one-half of its mineral products and wealth. Our plains and prairies are recognized as the granaries of the world. Cotton continues the king of plants, and the world's comfort and clothing are dependent upon the white fields of the South. We occupy to-day the foremost place in the world's commerce, our exports now exceeding those of Great Britain. Our wealth to-day is greater than that of any other nation. Recently we have become supreme in finance, our banking capital being the greatest possessed by any people. The world's financial heart now throbs in New York, and its pulsation affects the world. We now surpass all other nations in the amount of money expended for primary and general education, in the creation of colleges and splendid universities. In miles of railroad, navigable rivers, and improved harbors we are unsurpassed. Our progress in these directions has been so wonderful that its story reads more like romance than history.

Yet, Mr. President, as amazing as are these varied achievements, it is admitted that to-day we have the poorest public roads and highways of any civilized nation. Of the 2,155,000 miles of public roads within the United States, less than 200,000 miles are macadamized or improved with hard surfacing. Thus, more than nine-tenths of the public roads and highways of the United States during rainy seasons are almost impassable. No other enlightened people in the world are cursed with such a wretched condition. Our energies and our money have been generously expended in every other direction, except in the betterment of our public roads.

After careful examination and thoughtful consideration I am satisfied that our neglect in this respect has been one of the greatest misfortunes that has affected us as a people and should be remedied as quickly as possible. No one can overestimate the annual loss incurred by our people in traveling and hauling over these wretched public roads. Our internal commerce exceeds the interforeign commerce of the entire world. It is estimated that 90 per cent of our internal commerce must first or last be hauled over the public roads. The average haul of this vast commerce over the public highways, after careful investigation, has been estimated to be on an average of a little more than 9.4 miles. The same careful investigation fixes the average cost of hauling these products at 23 cents per ton per mile. The cost of hauling per mile over the splendid roads of France is on an average of about 7 cents per ton per mile. The average cost in England and Germany is about 11 cents per ton per mile. If the more important and main lines of our public-road system were improved as are those of France, Britain, and Germany, it is estimated by good authorities that our products could then be hauled over our entire system of roads at a cost of 12 or 13 cents per ton per mile. This would result in an annual saving in this item of hauling alone to the people of the United States of more than $250,000,000. This is the annual "mud tax" paid each year by the people of the United States in hauling their products over poor roads. This loss, if wisely and properly expended, would in 20 years macadam or furnish hard surfacing to all the public roads within the United States. But this does not include all the loss occasioned this country by its bad country roads. The poor condition of the roads makes it unprofitable to market much of the products of the farm. If the cost of transportation and the cost of production exceed the selling price, it makes it impossible for the producer to dispose of his products at a profit; hence production is arrested. In many sections farmers fail to raise certain crops because the cost of hauling them over miserable country roads is so great that they sustain loss instead of profit. The national loss from this source amounts annually to many million dollars. Our bad roads, making it impossible in many sections to market certain products of the farm, have prevented a great diversification of crops which exists in France, England, and Germany, with their splendid road system. We can not overestimate the loss and injury to agriculture resulting from this source.

Another great detriment that has come to this Nation from its wretched country roads is that it has forced the people to leave the rural sections and congregate in towns and cities. This fact is strikingly disclosed by the census returns. In 1790 only 3.4 per cent of our population dwelt in our cities; in 1850, 12.5; in 1900 the percentage was 40; in 1910 it was 46. This explains why so many acres of fertile land still remain untilled, while the city, with its unsanitary and unwholesome tenements, is crowded with human beings whose standards of living and methods of life result in their mental, moral, and physical decay. Statistics gathered by the Office of Public Roads and compared with the reports of the United States census reveal that in 25 counties, selected at random, possessing only 5.1 per cent of improved roads in 1904, the decrease of population averaged 3,112 for each county for the 10 years between 1890 and 1900. The records of this department further show that in 25 counties similarly selected, which possessed an average of 40 per cent of improved roads, there was an increase averaging 31,095 to the county. These significant facts show more eloquently than language the great benefits accruing from improved roads. Statistics gathered from the same source show how education and school attendance are affected by improved roads. These statistics show that in five States in which about 34 per cent of the roads are improved 77 out of each 100 pupils enrolled regularly attend the public schools. That in other five States in which the improved roads only amount to 1.5 per cent only 59 out of each 100 pupils enrolled regularly attend the public schools. These figures prove more forcibly than language the advantages accruing to education from good improved public highways.

Each census discloses that our urban population is very rapidly increasing at the expense of our rural sections. This is not desirable.

It means an immense national loss, not only financially, but morally, intellectually, and physically. The pleasures and profits of country life are largely dependent upon the condition of the public roads. Social intercourse and pleasure are only possible in those sections where comfortable traveling is possible over the roads.

Good school facilities and good public roads go hand in hand. They are companions which can not be separated. Carefully gathered statistics disclose that efficient country schools and the attendance of scholars are invariably dependent upon the condition of the public roads.

The country has been the great nursery which has furnished the men of genius and patriotism who have builded this mighty Nation.

We should do what we can to encourage our population to remain there, and develop our wonderful soil and agricultural resources.

Then, the agricultural people of this Nation are the mighty sources of patriotism and courage who will preserve this Nation in the coming hours of storm and stress.

Another great loss sustained by this Nation on account of its wretched public highways is that it has left undeveloped and uncultivated more than 400,000,000 acres of available and desirable land in the United States. If our roads were properly improved this land would be at once occupied by thrifty and prosperous farmers, thus adding greatly to the national wealth and power. Farm lands would greatly increase in value from improved public roads, and the country population would rapidly increase, greatly to the betterment of the Nation, both morally and materially.

Some economists have estimated that the annual loss to this Nation on account of wretched country roads exceeds more than $400,000,000 annually. I do not believe this is an exaggeration.

There are 850,000,000 acres of improved and unimproved farm land in the United States. It is estimated by the Agricultural Department that good roads would increase the value of this land from $2 to $9 per acre. This great increase of value would more than pay for the cost of improvement.

I feel justified in saying that one of the paramount questions before the American people to-day is the improvement of our public-road system. The farmer, in the future, in order to increase his profits, must reduce the cost of transportation. As the farming lands of Canada, South America, and Africa are opened and developed, the farmers of this country will have greater competition. To meet this competition, they will have to reduce either the cost of production or the cost of transportation. I hope this Congress will not adjourn without reducing greatly the cost of production. The cost of production in this country is greatly enhanced by the excessive tariff duties imposed upon everything purchased, on account of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

The Democrats of the House of Representatives have sought to bring the farmer relief from these excessive exactions by passing a bill known as the farmers' free-list bill, which, if enacted into law, will greatly reduce to him the cost of living and the cost of production. I hope the Senate will promptly concur in the passage of this bill, and this deserved relief will come to the great agricultural masses. The cost of transportation to the farmer is composed, first, of hauling over the public roads, and then over the railroad or steamboat lines to the markets. Within the last 70 years the cost of transportation over the railroads and waterways has greatly decreased, while the cost of transportation over the country roads has been increased. In 1837 railroad rates were 7½ cents per ton per mile. Now it is estimated that the average cost of hauling by rail is 7.8 mills per ton per mile, or about one-ninth of the original rate. Seventy years ago the charge for hauling on the old Cumberland Pike was 17 cents per ton per mile. This charge permitted a profit. It is now estimated that the cost to the farmers, without profit, is 23 cents per ton per mile. Thus, while transportation over railroads has decreased to about one-ninth of what it was about 67 years ago, transportation over the public roads has increased about 35 per cent. Water transportation has so decreased that it now costs the farmer 1.6 cents more to haul a bushel of wheat 9.4 miles from his barn to the depot than it does to haul it from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles. This fact strikingly illustrates the importance of road betterment not only to the farmer, but also to the rest of the country, who are users and consumers of farm products. The greatest saving to accrue in the future to farmers from reduced transportation will come not so much from reduced railroad transportation as from reduced cost of transportation over the public roads, resulting from their improvement.

We have now an Interstate Commerce Commission, fully empowered by law to see that the transportation rates imposed upon goods are not excessive and to give relief from railroad exactions promptly and efficiently. I have always favored giving this power to a commission, and I shall in every possible way sustain this commission in their efforts to prevent excessive freight charges and to give shippers fair and reasonable rates. I hope the present law is sufficient to accomplish this. If not, I am for its amendment until the people shall have the fullest measure of relief and justice in both freight and passenger rates.

This Nation, in the past, has contributed out of its Treasury vast sums of money and many million acres of land to encourage the construction of railroads, and to improve the rivers and harbors, in order to get cheap railroad and water transportation. More than 200,000,000 acres of land were conveyed to the railroads for this purpose. Each year witnesses vast appropriations for river and harbor improvements to reduce the cost of water transportation. The river and harbor bill of last year appropriated $31,000,000. I do not criticize these appropriations. Wisdom demands that our waterways should be improved, not only to furnish needed facilities for transportation, but also to compete with our railroads, and thus keep railroad rates reduced and fair. Our harbors should be improved so that our commerce, consisting of imports and exports, can be cheaply and promptly handled. This is beneficial alike to the manufacturing and agricultural interests; but I insist that, while the National Government spends this vast sum of money to accomplish these commendable purposes, it is derelict in its duty not to furnish an equal amount to the people who live in the country and can not use these waterways but are dependent upon the public highways for the transportation of their products. These people constitute a large part of our population. They bear their equal part of taxes. Since they have an equality of burdens, they should have an equality of benefits. The Government is properly and wisely generous and liberal in its river and harbor improvements; it should be equally as generous and liberal in its appropriations to the other sections of the country, whose inhabitants are absolutely dependent upon the public roads for their transportation. Justice demands this. The two should go together. The people who live near the rivers and harbors are as much interested in road improvement as are the people who live in the interior country. The people on the waterways need good roads to their wharves, from whence they ship their products. The people in the interior need good roads to their depots, from whence they ship their products.

Mr. President, the question naturally presents itself, Why is it that this Nation, which has achieved such wonderful success and progress in everything else, should be so backward in the construction and improvement of its public roads; especially when they are such important factors in the development of the Nation and the people annually sustain such a great loss from the prevalence of bad roads? The poor results obtained have been occasioned by the vicious system of road improvement and construction which has prevailed in this country. This Nation has foolishly left the construction, improvement, and repair of public roads almost entirely to the local communities through which they pass. While we have rapidly improved our agricultural, governmental, manufacturing, and general business methods, we have steadily adhered until recently to our antiquated system of road construction and improvement.

When this country was first settled we introduced here as a part of our road system the parish system then prevailing in England. This required that the local communities through which a road passed should construct and keep it in repair. This was done either by local taxes or local labor. This was the road law of England, passed in 1555, and continued there until some time in the eighteenth century. While this law existed in England the roads of England were as bad and impassable as are those of this country. In the eighteenth century England abandoned this localized system of road construction and repair and inaugurated her present system, which consists of a combination of parliamentary and local appropriations. By this joint action of national and local aid England immediately made wonderful progress in her road system, and to-day enjoys all the benefits that accrue from splendid highways. It is amazing that we have continued so long the vicious system which England abandoned many years ago. Experience has demonstrated everywhere the inability of local authorities unassisted to either construct or properly keep the mainly traveled roads in repair.

The roads of France, which are the best in the world, were constructed during the reign of Napoleon the Great, and consisted of the joint action and aid of the national and local authorities. Until this joint action occurred, the roads of France were wretched. Road construction in the United States presents a similar experience to those of England and France. Those States in the United States which possess good roads have only obtained them by the joint aid of the State and local authorities. Massachusetts possesses the best roads of any State in the Union. She had no road improvement of any consequence until the State united with the local authorities and furnished three-fourths of the funds for road construction and repair. As soon as this policy of State aid was adopted in Massachusetts a stimulus was given to road improvement, with wonderful results.

The States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and others, by the extension of State aid to local authorities in the construction and repair of public highways, have also achieved wonderful results, and these States are now blessed with fine roads, which are being rapidly increased.

We have a similar experience within the State of Virginia. Until 1906 there was practically no construction of macadam or hard-surfacing roads within the State. Though Virginia spent more than a million dollars per year on her roads, very poor results were obtained. The construction of roads was left entirely to the local authorities.

As candidate for governor of Virginia, I announced as one of the special policies that I would endeavor to inaugurate, if I should be elected, State aid for the construction of roads.

In my inaugural address I strongly recommended that the State should create a highway commission and furnish free to the local authorities experienced engineers and road builders to aid in making surveys and furnish suggestions and information in connection with the proper building of roads.

I also recommended that the convicts in the jails and those in the penitentiary with short terms of service should be furnished free to the local authorities to work upon the public roads, the State paying the cost of maintaining and guarding these convicts and the counties furnishing the material, thus sharing fairly the expense of construction.

The general assembly enacted these recommendations into laws, which were at once placed in operation. The department of highways proved a great success. The local authorities were enabled to get scientific engineers to aid them without expense, of which they gladly availed themselves. There was a greater demand for the convicts to be utilized for road construction than the State could supply.

When the next general assembly convened I recommended that the State should appropriate $250,000 out of its treasury, conditioned upon the counties furnishing an equal amount, which amount should be distributed among the counties in the State in proportion to the taxes paid by them into the State treasury and be confined to those counties which had not been able to obtain convicts during the year. This recommendation was enacted into law and has resulted in wonderful road development within the State. Nearly all the counties of the State availed themselves of the provisions of this law. By the operation of these laws in Virginia, extending aid to the local communities, more than 500 miles of good hard-surfaced roads have been constructed.

The interest in road improvement has been greatly stimulated and is rapidly increasing. The interest in road construction has been so stimulated that 16 counties have voted bond issues for the construction of permanent roads aggregating $2,823,000. When this amount shall have been expended Virginia will possess many miles of splendid roads.

It should be noted that the educational progress and improvement kept pace with the road improvement, as previously stated. The desire for good educational facilities and for good roads seems to go hand in hand. Before 1906 there were only 74 high schools within the State of Virginia, and most of these were located in the towns and cities. The State, out of its treasury, appropriated $100,000 to aid in the establishment of rural high schools, conditioned upon the local authorities uniting with the State. Under the operation of this law in four years the high schools of the State were increased from 74, as previously stated, to 405. More than one-half of the magisterial districts of the State rapidly acquired splendid high schools. The stimulation to this, like the stimulation to road construction, came from the State aid extended. The primary schools all over the State have also had greatly increased attendance, longer terms, and better facilities from the increased special State appropriations.

By this appropriation of State aid to schools and roads the rural communities, which are not rich, were greatly benefited.

In Virginia about 52 per cent of the taxes in the treasury are paid by the cities. Thus, by this system, the rich cities of the State paid more than one-half of the special appropriations made by the State to the country communities for schools and roads.

I wish to say that this law was passed without any objection from the representatives of the cities. They generously supported the bill, and were willing to thus assist the country in making its great material and educational advance.

Mr. President, what is still more striking in this matter is that the expenses incurred by the State for its increased appropriations for education and roads and other progressive policies more than paid for themselves in the increased revenues derived by the State on account of the increased prosperity and advance of values. Without any increase of taxes whatever the revenues of Virginia for the years 1908 and 1909 increased over the revenues of the two previous years more than $916,000, although these years immediately followed the panic of 1907. But for this panic and the long stagnation of business which followed, the increase would have been still greater.

This demonstrates that investments of public money for wise and beneficial purposes more than pay for themselves, not only to the State in the increased revenues but also in the increased happiness and prosperity of its individual citizens.

All this conclusively proves to my mind that the Federal Government should aid the States and local authorities in the construction of good public highways by generous appropriations out of the Treasury. Not until this is done will we witness the creation of a successful system of road construction.

The travel over our roads now is national, State, and local. The travel being national, State, and local, the cost of constructing and maintaining roads should be national, State, and local. It is not just to expect local communities to construct and maintain roads over which the travel of State and Nation far exceeds the local. It is utterly impossible for local communities to bear the expense of constructing macadam or hard-surface roads. To do so would require such a heavy tax as to practically bankrupt the communities. A system must be devised whereby this expense can be fairly distributed. The only way that this can be accomplished is by the appropriation of money out of the State and National Treasuries.

The cities are as much interested and are as much benefited by good country roads as are the people in the rural sections. Good roads enable the people of the country to easily come to market not only with their produce, but also to make purchases. The trade and commerce of cities are greatly enhanced by being surrounded by splendid roads. In addition, it adds to the comfort and pleasure of those living in the cities. Thus, good roads enhance the value of property alike in city and country. Many of the cities, when permitted to do so by their charters, have united with country communities in appropriating money for the construction and maintenance of public roads. The charters of many of the cities prohibit them from making such appropriations. The best and the fairest way to enable the cities to aid rural sections in the construction and maintenance of good roads is by appropriating a fair share of money for this purpose out of the State and National Treasuries. By this means the cities and rich communities are enabled to share with the country sections their fair burden of road construction and improvement.

Since both city and country receive benefits from good roads, each should share its part of the burden. I believe this is willingly conceded alike by the citizens of the city and country.

Mr. President, in addition to the reasons previously presented as to why the National Government should extend its aid for the improvement of public highways of our country there are other considerations of justice and fair dealing which demand this. The United States Government now uses more than 1,000,000 miles of the public roads of this country in carrying its mails over them, either through its star-route contractors or its rural-delivery carriers. It uses daily this vast mileage of roads without giving to the States or communities a cent of compensation. Last year this Government paid to the railroads of this Nation $50,142,200 for using their tracks to carry its mails over their roads.

The counties and States contribute their money for the construction and maintenance of these country roads as much as do the stockholders of the railroads for the construction and maintenance of their railway tracks. If it is just and fair that the Government should pay this vast sum of money for utilizing the tracks of the railroads, it is equally as just and fair that the Government should contribute a fair compensation to the States and communities for using their roads for the conveyance of the Government's mails. An argument for the one is equally as conclusive as for the other.

Hence, I insist that as the carrying of mail is a Government function, and entirely monopolized by the Government, that the Government should make just and fair compensation to the States and communities for the use of their roads. The time has come when the States and local communities should insist upon this.

Another consideration which strongly presents itself to my mind as to why the Government should extend national aid to road improvement is that it would result in the saving of a great deal of money to the Government. The Government now expends $42,000,000 annually for rural delivery. The average route of a rural-delivery carrier is about 24 miles. The carrier is unable to make a greater distance than this on account of the bad condition of the public roads.

If these roads were properly improved, a carrier could easily and with more comfort deliver mail a third longer distance. It is estimated if the roads of the country were properly improved that in the reduced expenses incurred in its star-route service, in its present Rural Delivery Service, and in the extensions which will certainly come in the future, the Government would save $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 annually. Patriotism and wisdom alike demand that the Government should make this great saving and at the same time add materially in the advancement and prosperity of our country by generously aiding road improvement.

Mr. President, I am unable to see any strong reasons why the Federal Government should further hesitate in the extension of a proper and liberal appropriation for the construction and improvement of public highways. To contend that it has no constitutional power to do so is absurd. No one has ever disputed that the Government has not power to establish, maintain, and repair post roads. It has established through its star route and Rural Delivery Service more than 1,000,000 miles of post roads, which it daily uses; hence it not only has the power under the Constitution, but also has imposed upon it the imperative duty to bear its fair share of the burden of improving these roads and keeping them in proper repair.

Webster, Clay, Jefferson, and even Calhoun, who was very strict in his construction of the Constitution, all advocated national aid for the construction of public highways.

Prior to the Civil War the Federal Government had appropriated $14,000,000 to aid in the construction of public highways.

The 1,000,000 miles of public roads now made post roads by the uses of the Federal Government are the main roads traveled and the ones most needing betterment; hence no objection on constitutional grounds can be found for the Government undertaking to bear its fair share of the burden of improving the roads that it daily uses.

Besides, this Government has spent large sums of money in the betterment of the public roads of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and also Alaska. If it has the authority to expend the public money there for these purposes, it has equal authority to expend the public money for these purposes in this country.

I believe that the American people have greater demands upon the Public Treasury, filled with their contributions, than have the people of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands and Alaska.

I am not one of those who would retard progress and prosperity in the United States by refusing to aid in road construction here and generously contribute the taxes paid by our people for road construction in our colonies.

The citizens of the United States demand that they shall be treated by the Government as generously and considerately in the matter of road improvement as has been extended to the people of these colonies.

Mr. President, some maintain that if the Government ever ventures into appropriations for road improvement there will be no limit to the expenditures made and the Federal Government will be finally bankrupt. This argument should have no weight. Every appropriation for public roads that is wisely spent will make this nation richer and greater. Bankruptcy never comes from increasing wealth and prosperity, but from increasing poverty and decay. The greatest national need to-day is good roads. The elimination of our greatest evil will bring increased wealth, increased health, increased moral and material advance.

This is precisely the same argument which was used against the establishment of rural delivery. I was a member of the Post Office Committee when the first appropriation of $10,000 was made for rural delivery. From the beginning I was a stanch friend and earnest advocate of this system. When the first appropriation of $10,000 was made the Post Office Department refused to experiment with the appropriation. Not until the appropriation was made peremptory would the department make the experiment to ascertain whether rural delivery was possible or not. As soon as the experiment was made with a few routes it was so successful that its extension became rapid. After the appropriation for this purpose had become several million dollars its enemies made a determined fight in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and in the House of Representatives to destroy the system, claiming that it would bankrupt the Treasury. A report was made by the Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives, concurred in by all the members of that committee except Mr. Cromer and myself, which would have perverted the Rural Delivery system into a star-route system, and practically destroyed it.

After two weeks of debate the bill and the report of the Committee on the Post Office Department of the House of Representatives was defeated and rural delivery saved to the people. In making this fight for rural delivery I contended then that it would ultimately more than pay for itself by the increased revenues it would bring to the Government, in addition to the great benefits it would bring to the rural sections.

The history of rural delivery has verified the truth of my prophecy and overthrown the forebodings of those who maintained that it would deplete the Treasury.

The establishment of rural delivery by the abolition of star routes and post offices has saved this Government more than $26,000,000. The entire service now only costs $42,000,000. The difference between the saving and the cost, amounting to $16,000,000, I believe, is more than made up by the increased sale of postage occasioned by the extension of rural delivery.

I prophesied that rural delivery as a supplement to the post-office service would so increase postal receipts I believed before long the Post Office Department of the Government would be practically self-sustaining. This has now been realized. We will have exactly the same experience when the Government is wise enough and generous enough to extend aid in the improvement of its post roads. This will give increased mail facilities over them, which will bring increased revenues to the Government. It will enable the Government to transmit its mails over its post roads with increased facilities and at greatly reduced cost.

Not only justice but prudential foresight to protect its own revenues demand that this Government should cooperate with the States and local communities in improvement of the public highways, of which it to-day is a user of more than one-half.

Mr. President, to carry out these views expressed by me I have prepared and introduced a bill, which I shall, at the proper time, press for consideration and passage before the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, of which I am a member, and also the Senate. This bill provides that the Government shall appropriate $20,000,000 annually for the next five years for the purpose of improving the post roads and rural delivery routes now used by the Government.

By limiting the appropriations to the post roads and rural delivery routes it removes all constitutional objections that could possibly be urged.

In addition, it appropriates the money to the roads most needed to be improved. There is scarcely a road which is used to any considerable extent that is not used by the United States Government either as a rural delivery route or a star route.

Thus this limitation presents no difficulty whatever as to the roads to be improved. It opens up more than 1,000,000 miles of roads for governmental aid.

The bill provides that the States or local authorities shall furnish an amount equal to that furnished by the Federal Government. This shares the burden of road construction equally between the Government and the States and the local communities benefited. This is the system which has been productive of the most progressive and beneficial results in England, France, and Germany.

The bill provides that this $20,000,000 shall be divided among the States according to population, excluding in the estimate cities which have, as shown by the last census, a population exceeding 150,000. As the money is intended to improve roads in the rural sections, I thought this could be accomplished better by this provision excluding the large cities in making up the distribution. By doing this the money will be distributed in the sections where good roads are most needed and where the people are least able locally to bear the cost of construction.

I inserted that the appropriation should be made for five years in order to enable a comprehensive scheme of road improvement to be devised. Also I am satisfied if the States and local communities knew that this appropriation would be continued for five years they would more generously respond in providing their share to be utilized for road construction. I think this very important.

The Federal appropriation is left under the control of the Federal authorities created under the bill. After the amount has been assigned to each State and Territory, the roads upon which the money is to be expended for improvement is determined by the joint agreement of the Federal and State authorities. This insures to the State and Nation that the money will be expended where each is benefited. As each contributes to the fund used, each should have a voice in determining where the money should be expended. I believe this will result in wise administration and prevent jealousy between Federal and State authorities.

The Virginia law provides similar provisions where State aid is extended to the counties, the location of the road being fixed by the joint action of the State highway commissioner and the county authorities. An experience of four years has demonstrated the wisdom of this provision. No friction has occurred and each has been satisfied that the money appropriated was wisely and properly expended.

The local authorities have been more ready to respond in making their contributions when they knew that they would have a voice in the expenditure and location of the roads.

The bill provides that the contracts shall be opened and awarded by the joint action of the Federal and State authorities. This prevents all possibilities of fraud and will satisfy the Federal and State Governments that their interests will be thus properly protected.

The road must also be accepted, when improved, by the joint action of Federal and State authorities. This insures performance of contract satisfactory to each.

The cost is then paid by the Federal authorities out of the Treasury, and a request is made upon the State for the payment of its share. If the State fails to promptly pay its share of the cost, then no further payment can be made to the State out of the road fund. This protects the Federal Government from paying any money until it has received full value by the construction of the roads under contract. It also gives it proper protection for the payment of more than its half. It gives the State and local authorities time in which to furnish their share of the expense. When the road is improved and contract fulfilled, the road continues under the control of the State and its authorities as heretofore.

I have endeavored in this bill to provide efficient Federal aid without interfering whatever with the authority of the States in the control of its public roads and highways. I have also endeavored to so safeguard the Federal Government that it would spend no money and incur no expense except after it had received full value in improved roads.

The bill makes provision for the creation of a road department, with engineers and capable officials to carry out the purposes contemplated.

I think that by the joint action of Federal and State authorities improper political influences in connection with road improvement and construction will be prevented. The joint action of State and Nation will, I believe, be productive of the best results. It does not impair the rights of the States in any respect over their public roads, but does provide an efficient way for the Federal Government to render aid without having its money wasted.

The Federal Government has now a bureau in the Agricultural Department well experienced and equipped to undertake this work on its part. Hence the Government can without fear undertake this work, with the full assurance that its money will be wisely expended and bring many accruing benefits.

The Government can easily afford to appropriate this $20,000,000 for five years for this purpose. Our appropriations last year amounted to $1,041,000,000. The Government can afford to begin by appropriating $20,000,000 annually for road betterment. After a few years, when the system has been fully developed and experienced and capable engineers obtained, and the needs and requirements of road improvement fairly ascertained, the Government should make larger appropriations. Of this vast amount now annually appropriated but a very small per cent of it is expended in the rural sections. Justice and fair dealing demand that the rural sections should have their fair share of Federal appropriations, and this can only be obtained by appropriations for road improvement, which is beneficial not only to the country but to all parts of this great Nation.

I believe, if the Federal Government will immediately make this appropriation and inaugurate as a part of our Federal system national aid to roads, in a few years we will witness a wonderful improvement in our public roads. We will have the same gratifying experience in rapid road improvement that we have had in those States that have extended State aid, and in those nations, like England and France, which give national aid.

Mr. President, the last national platform of both parties favored the Federal Government aiding public roads. The Republican platform contained the following:

> We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads maintained more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of abutting property owners. In this work we commend the growing practice of State aid, and we approve the efforts of the National Agricultural Department, by experiment and otherwise, to make clear to the public the best methods of road construction.

While this platform is somewhat ambiguous, yet its intention was to convey to the voters of the country that the Republican Party favored national aid for road improvement.

The declaration contained in the Democratic platform is clear, explicit, and leaves no question of doubt. It is as follows:

> We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

I have drawn my bill so as to carry out the purposes so clearly indicated in the national Democratic platform.

The House of Representatives, now controlled by the Democratic Party, is clearly committed to national aid for the improvement of the post roads of this country. I feel satisfied that the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives will fulfill this pledge and promise made to the people in its platform.

I hope the Senate and the members of both parties, Republicans and Democrats, will unite in aiding this great movement for road improvement by suitable legislation and appropriation which will result in immeasurable benefits to this country.

I believe in parties and public officials conscientiously and strictly fulfilling the pledges made to the people in order to obtain position and power.

As the Democratic Party stands pledged in unequivocal language that the Federal Government should aid the State and local authorities in improving all its post roads, I shall exert myself to the utmost as long as I am a Member of the Senate to have this pledge fulfilled.

The bill that I have prepared and introduced, I believe, fulfills this pledge, is carefully safeguarded, and will be promotive of splendid results.

It is modeled somewhat after the Virginia law, applying Federal aid in a similar manner that Virginia extends State aid. The Virginia law has proven so satisfactory and has worked so smoothly and successfully that I feel satisfied this law if enacted by Congress would prove equally so.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say that I am not wedded to any special bill, nor am I possessed of any pride of authorship which would deter me from supporting any fair and reasonable bill extending proper national aid to the State and local authorities in the improvement of the public roads. I am deeply concerned in this matter. I am convinced that it is one of the most important problems demanding proper solution before the American people to-day. I am satisfied that the Federal Government has delayed too long and should delay no longer extending to the State and local authorities generous aid for road improvement. All measures tending to the accomplishment of this purpose shall have my earnest and cordial support. When the Federal Government commences to bear its fair share of the burden of improving our public roads, that day will mark the beginning of the end of bad roads in this Nation. It will open a new chapter in our history, each leaf of which when turned will gleam with more happy country homes, better schools and churches, and larger and more prosperous rural communities. Imagination would be powerless to picture through the vista of the coming years the increased health and happiness, the increased wealth and power, and the great moral and material advance which would come to this Republic upon the inauguration of this great national policy.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the progressive movement in this country has for its object the overthrow of commercialism in government and the restoration of equality of opportunity and of the rights of human beings in preference, where the choice must be made, to the rights merely of property accumulation. The chief purpose of the progressive movement is to overthrow the chief agency of commercialism in government, machine politics and the rule of the minority through corrupt practices, and to restore the rule of the majority through honest registration laws and election laws. This is to be accomplished by the passage of certain tried and tested statutes, including, particularly, the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act, complete publicity of all public business, and including the commission form of government for municipalities, or the short-ballot system. The commission form of government may be properly regarded as a very important auxiliary in the progressive movement.

The commission form of government has a national value and a direct bearing upon the integrity of the election of Senators and Congressmen, because it is an important agency in overthrowing corrupt machine politics in municipalities and cities. The proportion of inhabitants living in cities, as compared to the inhabitants of the United States, is 53.7 per cent, not counting towns of less than 2,500 inhabitants. IF CORRUPT GOVERNMENT CAN BE TERMINATED IN CITIES, IT CAN NOT SURVIVE IN THE STATES OR IN THE NATION.

The relative urban and suburban population of the different States I submit as Exhibit A.

Machine politics and their centers of activity are in the cities, and if corrupt political organization can be overthrown in cities it will go far toward establishing integrity of government throughout the States and throughout the Nation, as machine politics do not easily flourish among country people who are not so easily reached or so easily influenced by machine methods.

The commission form of government eliminates mere partisan politics in cities, towns, and villages in the government of such municipalities. The commission form of government usually carries with it the initiative, referendum, and recall, giving home government popular government, the people's rule enabling the citizens of each town to control the governing business in that town. It enables them, through the initiative, referendum, and recall, to initiate and pass any law they do want, including corrupt-practices prevention acts, and veto any law they do not want, such as the granting of franchises of value without consideration, and enables them to recall inefficient or dishonest officials.

For these reasons I have thought it worth while to call to the attention of the Senate and of the country the importance of the commission form of city government as an agency in restoring integrity of government and overthrowing the corruption and inefficiency which have so seriously invaded the governing function under color of partisan zeal.

WHAT THE COMMISSION FORM OF CITY GOVERNMENT IS.

The commission form of government, as usually understood, may be illustrated with the system adopted in Des Moines, Iowa, under the act of the general assembly of that State (Exhibit B) and the charter of that city (Exhibit C).

The general plan is that the citizens by primary may nominate candidates for mayor and four commissioners, who shall have complete charge of town business—legislative, executive, and judicial. Any person can be nominated by a petition of 25 citizens. The 10 candidates having the highest vote at the primary two weeks later are submitted to the citizens for an election, and the 5 candidates having the highest votes at this election comprise the city council, with full powers—legislative, executive, and judicial. They manage the business as completely as the board of directors could manage the business of a bank. There are five departments, as follows:

First. A department of public affairs.
Second. A department of accounts and finance.
Third. A department of public safety.
Fourth. A department of streets and improvements.
Fifth. A department of parks and public property.

The mayor, by virtue of his office, has charge of the department of public affairs, with general supervision over the other departments, and receives a salary of $3,500. The other commissioners receive a salary of $3,000. The council, by majority vote, appoints all other officials of the town—city clerk, solicitor, tax assessor, police judge, treasurer, auditor, civil engineer, city physician, marshal, chief of fire department, street commissioner, library trustees, and all other necessary officers and assistants. These selections are made under a board of civil service commissioners, who conduct examinations of a practical character to determine the fitness of applicants. Each commissioner appoints the subordinate employees in his own department and each commissioner is held responsible for the successful management of his department.

Extreme pains are taken to prevent fraud in the elections. For instance, the fullest publicity is required of campaign funds. Both the source and the manner of expenditures are required to be reported under oath. No officer or employee is permitted to be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract with the city or in any public-service corporation, or to accept any free service therefrom. All council meetings to which any person not a city officer is admitted must be open to the public.

"All franchises or right to use the streets, highways, or public places of the city can be granted, renewed, or extended only by ordinance, and every franchise or grant for interurban or street railways, gas or water works, electric light or power plants, heating plants, telegraph or telephone systems, or public-service utilities must be authorized or approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon at a general or special election.

"Every motion, resolution, and ordinance of the council must be in writing, and the vote of every member of the council, for and against it, must be recorded. The council is required to print and effectively distribute each month, in pamphlet form, a detailed, itemized statement of all receipts and expenses and a summary of its proceedings during the preceding month. At the end of each year the council must cause a full and complete examination of all the books and accounts of the city to be made by competent accountants and publish the report in pamphlet form.

" Every ordinance or resolution appropriating money or ordering any street improvements or sewers, or making or authorizing any contract, or granting any franchises must be complete in its final form and remain on file with the city clerk for public inspection at least one week before its final passage or adoption, and must be at all times open to public inspection." (Hamilton.)

Nothing is permitted to be done in secrecy or in the dark. The public business is public.

PARTISANSHIP IN CITY BUSINESS ELIMINATED.

Partisanship is eliminated. No party emblems are permitted on the ticket, but the candidates are listed in serial order, without party designation, and are nominated and elected as far as possible on the ground of personal fitness. In this way partisanship is carefully and deliberately eliminated, as far as practicable.

Ward lines are abolished in the choice of city commissioners, so that each citizen votes for every commissioner, both in nominating and in electing him.

THE WARD SYSTEM ABOLISHED.

The abolition of the ward system is essential to the successful establishment of the commission form of government. The ward system in the past has been peculiarly injurious to good government because " it perverts the political education of the electors and encourages a local selfishness destructive of the general and ultimately of the local interests as well. The ward system leads to the nomination of a ward boss, who, under color of intense zeal for that ward and under color of being a great advocate of a political party and by petty ward politics, gets himself elected and tries to keep himself in power by getting things for that ward, more than it would be equitably entitled to and at the expense of the balance of the city. This policy leads to unscrupulous men making combinations in the council, trading with each other, and taking advantage of the portions of the city whose representatives are more scrupulous.

A city is best governed whose government deals with the city as a body unit and where its general interests are held paramount to local, private, or ward selfishness.

Citizens at large nominate men who would not be nominated by the ward system, and thus narrow or unscrupulous men are prevented from so easily entering the council. It prevents wards trading in the council at the expense of the city. It prevents extravagance in wards by virtue of such trading.

The abolition of the ward system elevates the character of the officials of the city, and what is far more important, it elevates the electorate of the city by making the citizens feel that they have power to nominate and elect the entire governing board of the city.

We observe in New York City recently a ward boss giving away 7,000 pairs of shoes, apparently from pure benevolence, but more likely for the reason that he could by this process of commendable charity and open-hearted generosity control 7,000 votes in his ward and put himself in a position where he could indirectly recoup himself with usury at the expense of the taxpayers of that great municipality.

THE ESSENTIAL FEATURES OF THE COMMISSION FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

The essential value and features of the commission form of government are, roughly, as follows:

First. Complete centralization and concentration of all power and responsibility in a small council or commission, usually of five members, doing away with the separation of powers into the legislative, executive, and judicial. This is fundamental. The commission is thus directly charged with and responsible for the entire administration of the city's affairs.

Second. The members of the commission must be elected at large and not by wards, and therefore represent the city as a whole, not by subdivisions.

Third. The members of the commission must be the only elective officers of the city, and must have the power of appointing all subordinate administrative officials.

Fourth. The commission must have the power of removing subordinate administrative city officials at will.

Fifth. The commission should be subject to the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, so that if the commission fails to pass the laws the people do want, such laws can be passed by the initiative petition; and so that if the commission propose to pass any law the people do not want, they shall have the right of veto by referendum petition; and so that, if a commissioner proves to be inefficient or corrupt, his successor may be nominated and he may be recalled by a special or general election.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to ask him just a question here?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. By whom would they be nominated; by what process, if the board has control of all the political affairs? I am curious to know who would nominate those men who were to take the place of the commissioners who were removed or recalled?

Mr. OWEN. Twenty-five per cent of the electors, under the charter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would they meet to do it in some organized way?

Mr. OWEN. By petition.

Mr. HEYBURN. So far as I have heard the Senator, there is no provision under which they could act. Twenty-five per cent of the people scattered among the body of the people could not act.

Mr. OWEN. They submit verified petitions to the city clerk, and that automatically calls for the election under the charter. There is a very exact method provided for calling the election under the charter, a copy of which I submit.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then this would be a Government by 25 per cent of the people. I see.

Mr. OWEN. It would permit 25 per cent of the people to petition for the recall of an inefficient or corrupt official and permit 51 per cent of the people to determine the recall of the public servant; or, on the other hand, give a vote of confidence and confirm the official in his public office.

THE PROTEST.

A special provision of the Des Moines charter enables the citizens to prevent the council fastening objectionable legislation upon the city by a protest of 25 per cent of the number of electors previously voting for mayor. Upon the filing of this protest the council must either reconsider and repeal the ordinance objected to or submit it to a vote of the people for acceptance or rejection.

THE RESULTS.

The result of this system has been to abolish the corrupt ward system, with its mischievous waste, inefficiency, and dishonesty. It has eliminated partisanship, and no longer can a ward boss appeal to his fellow citizens to stand by him as the exponent of "the grand old party" of Lincoln, Grant, and McKinley, nor can he appeal to the disciples of Thomas Jefferson with any better effect. His views on the tariff or currency are not regarded as of any importance, but his relation to the gamblers, the law-defying saloon keepers, the political jobbers, public-service corporation and municipal contractors, and his fitness to make a good municipal officer are closely scrutinized by the great body of the citizens of the municipality.

The direct and undivided responsibility and the full power placed in the hands of each commissioner obtains from him his best efforts and the best results.

This system has reestablished popular supremacy in the cities adopting it. There is no doubt that everything bad in city politics is the work of the few and not of the many, and that these few have been led by trained mercenaries, who have paid themselves out of the public treasury, directly or indirectly, for packing caucuses, padding registration lists, repeating, stealing or stuffing ballot boxes, perpetrating frauds in the casting of votes, and doing the thousand and one more or less disreputable things which in American cities have been counted as "helping the party."

The direct rule of the people has been established by the commission form of city government in lieu of all this. They have under this system the right of direct nomination (selection) and election of officials, freedom from fraud, complete publicity, and they have the right of the initiative, referendum, protest, and recall, compelling respect of the popular will, both affirmatively and negatively. In this manner the people are stimulated in a sense of civic righteousness and power and of personal civic responsibility. It has established the rule of the people in town government and has dethroned the city boss and terminated corrupt ward and municipal partisan politics.

Of course, no city can rise higher than the level of its citizenship, but whatever the intelligence and conscience of the citizens of a town are capable of may be attained through this improved method of governing municipalities.

Under this system the public business is conducted with efficiency, promptness, free from blackmail, and free from the petty rascalities, free from the "grand and petty larceny" that have heretofore characterized municipal councils. A request of the commission can be acted upon in an hour, and it is not necessary to run the gauntlet of a corrupt house and council of the old city legislatures, with the long delays and blackmail incident thereto.

Under the civil service, the city employees are chosen upon a basis of merit and actual worth and not as a reward for activity in helping the ward boss to keep himself in power.

City franchises are safeguarded under this new system. It is impossible for the council to sell a franchise by secret barter, or to deliver such a franchise if sold, and no corrupt interest can afford to buy or attempt to buy franchises under these conditions, where delivery is impossible and dangerous.

The causes of corruption are removed. The temptation to corruption is removed. Powerful safeguards against corruption are thus established.

The plan in actual operation has shown the most remarkable results in clean streets and alleys, improved sidewalks and paving, better administration of all public utilities, and freedom from favoritism; and justice and common sense are in control.

In Des Moines the old "red-light" district, which was owned and controlled by a social-evil trust of "appalling cruelty, greed, and wickedness," was turned into a respectable neighborhood by the vigor and vigilance of a well-directed police force. The city offices are filled by men expert and capable of rendering high-class services. The books and records have been brought up to date and are kept in intelligible condition.

I will observe here that the cities which have adopted this method have adopted in many cases a comparative uniformity of bookkeeping, by which the condition of various departments and services of municipalities are able to be compared one with another, so that a city finding a very high cost in some particular line as compared with other cities in the same department or service may make an inquiry into that particular branch of the service. In that way, by concentrating attention on defective services, they are able to eliminate the wastefulness by which their accounts have been run up in that special branch of the administration. An immense saving of money has been made, and the people are delighted with the splendid results of the new government.

The elections have worked admirably. "Not for a generation has so little money been spent and never have the citizens been able to give their attention so undividedly to the prime issues of a municipal campaign—the honesty, capacity, and fidelity of those seeking public place."

The success of the Des Moines system was due to the activity, first, of James H. Berryhill, of Des Moines, who had business interests in Galveston and who had seen the working of the commission government in that city. The Des Moines Register and Leader, the News, and the Capital, of which the Hon. Lafayette Young, our recent colleague in the Senate, was editor, are entitled to special credit, together with the Bar Association of the State of Iowa and the public debates which were held in this connection. It took the most resolute effort for several years to accomplish this result and get over the opposition of the old machine in Des Moines and Iowa and their influence with the legislature, but, thanks to the patriotic and good men of that State, the legislature gave the necessary authority.

I submit results of the commission form of government in Galveston and Houston, Tex., Leavenworth, Kans., Des Moines and Cedar Rapids, Iowa, as given by Hamilton. (Exhibit D.)

I submit also a list of over a hundred of the cities which have adopted this plan for the last two years. (Exhibit E.)

I expressly acknowledge indebtedness to John J. Hamilton and his excellent work on the "Dethronement of the City Boss" (Funk & Wagnalls); to Ford H. MacGregor, Bulletin No. 423 of the University of Wisconsin; to Prof. Frank Parsons's "The City of the People," published by C. F. Taylor, 1520 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.; "The Digest of Short Ballot Charters," by Charles A. Beard, Ph. D., The Short Ballot Organization, 383 Fourth Avenue, New York; and Buffalo Conference for Good City Government, Clinton Rogers Woodruff, editor.

The constitutionality of the Texas law giving municipalities the right of recall, rendered by the civil court of appeals, I submit as Exhibit F.

Seventy-four cities and towns in the State of New York, I am informed by the secretary of the Commission Government Association of Buffalo, are considering this method, and a large number of them have petitioned the New York Legislature for the right of home government for cities. Up to this time, in spite of promises, those in control of the governing business, including the bipartisan machine men in New York State, have denied them their just rights of local self-government. and it will require a pitched battle with the forces of machine politics to obtain this right for these cities, the chief of which is Buffalo, with over 400,000 inhabitants.

The Short Ballot Organization, of which the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, governor of New Jersey, is the president, has excited a very great interest throughout the Union, and it is easily applicable not only to cities, but also to counties and States, the purpose being to concentrate the attention of the electorate upon a few responsible men charged with the control of policies and administrative responsibility, so that the people may give their concentrated attention to these few officials and choose them wisely.

It is impossible to have the people choose wisely when they are called upon by the party bosses and party machines to vote on 200 or 300 names at a time. Tammany Hall, for example, has a committeeman for each 25 voters of New York City, a committee so large that Madison Square Garden could not hold it. Its primary ballot contains from 300 to a thousand names. The consequence is that democracy is defeated and "bossism" is enthroned.

Gov. Johnson, of California, put the matter in a nutshell in his last annual message, when he said:

> It is time we stopped scolding the voters for their inattention to the offices at the foot of the ticket and cut the ballot down to the number of officials that they will take the trouble to select. The job of reforming the voter is too big. He has a living to make and has to have some fun as he goes along. But the job of reforming the ballot is simple. All that is needed is to cut out the offices that have to do merely with the routine and clerical work and call on the voter to elect only those that control policies.

Over 200 cities and towns have adopted some form of this improved method of city government within the last two years, the list submitted being incomplete and imperfect.

I submit a form of ballot used by Grand Junction, Colo., which is the most improved form of municipal ballot that has yet been adopted. The Grand Junction ballot gives the first, second, and third choice to each citizen for the members of the city council. If there are not a sufficient number of votes of the first choice to give a majority of the votes, then the first and second choices are added together. If that does not give a majority, then the first, second, and third choices are added together, which always results in a majority vote, so that it requires no nomination and subsequent election. One election is enough. At one election the public officials are both nominated and elected. It is economical and it is satisfactory in its results and operation.

OFFICIAL BALLOT.

GENERAL MUNICIPAL ELECTION, CITY OF GRAND JUNCTION, COLO., NOVEMBER 2, A. D. 1909.

INSTRUCTIONS.—To vote for any person, make a cross (X) in ink in the square in the appropriate column according to your choice, at the right of the name voted for. Vote your first choice in the first column; vote your second choice in the second column; vote any other choice in the third column; vote only one first and only one second choice. Do not vote more than one choice for one person, as only one choice will count for any candidate by this ballot. Omit voting for one name for each office, if more than one candidate therefor. All distinguishipg marks make the ballot void. If you wrongly mark, tear, or deface this ballot, return it and obtain another.

No. 769.

Official ballot for election precinct No. 16, in Grand Junction, Mesa County, Colo., November 2, 1909.

H. F. VORBECK, City Clerk.

The following letter of Karl A. Bickel, Esq., of Grand Junction, Colo., explains its working:

STATE OF COLORADO,
LEGAL DEPARTMENT, INHERITANCE TAX DIVISION.

Senator ROBERT L. OWEN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

In re sample preferential ballot, with results in one set shown:

Had the election been conducted under the old-style plan, as is common in 85 per cent of American cities, Bannister, the "old-gang" candidate, would have been elected. Had it been conducted along the cumbersome Des Moines system, the race would have been between Aupperle and Bannister. Yet when the people had fully and accurately expressed themselves on all the candidates and demonstrated their full choice, it was shown that Bannister was not within the first three of being the most desired man, and that Aupperle did not have within 196 votes of a majority of all votes cast, and that Todd was the only man of the six who did have the support of a majority of the voters—that is, a majority of the voters would rather have Todd elected than any other man, although a large number of those who voted for Todd had preferences above him. The preferential system keeps the whole people organized to smash the organized minority and prevents minority rule. There were not as many spoiled ballots as a result of the G. J. preferential election than usual in the Australian-ballot elections.

K. A. BICKEL.

Mr. President, I have submitted this matter because I regard it as having very great influence upon the integrity of the Government of the United States. This method has been found to work so well that, within the strict interpretation of what might be called a commission form of government, there are nearly 200 cities that have recently, within three years past, adopted this method of governing in 27 States, and if it would not weary the Senate I should like to call attention to some of them.

The two great cities of Alabama, for instance, Birmingham and Montgomery.

In California, Santa Cruz, Berkeley, Modesto, Oakland, San Diego, San Luis Obispo, Vallejo, and Monterey.

In Colorado, Colorado Springs, Grand Junction, and, I believe, Denver now has adopted it.

Idaho, Lewiston.

Illinois, Carbondale, Decatur, Dixon, Elgin, Hillsboro, Jacksonville, Kewanee, Moline, Ottawa, Pekin, Rochelle, Rock Island, Springfield, Spring Valley, Waukegan, and Clinton.

Iowa, Burlington, Cedar Rapids, Davenport, Des Moines, Fort Dodge, Keokuk, Marshalltown, and Sioux City.

Kansas, Anthony, Abilene, Coffeyville, Cherryvale, Caldwell, Council Grove, Dodge City, Emporia, Eureka, Girard, Hutchinson, Independence, Iola, Leavenworth, Kansas City, Marion, Newton, Neodesha, Parsons, Pittsburg, Topeka, Wichita, and Wellington.

Kentucky, Newport.

Louisiana, Shreveport.

Maryland, Cumberland.

Massachusetts, Gloucester, Haverhill, Lynn, and Taunton.

Michigan, Harbor Beach, Port Huron, Pontiac, and Wyandotte.

Mississippi, Clarksdale and Hattiesburg.

Minnesota, Faribault and Mankato.

New Mexico, Roswell.

North Carolina, Greensboro, High Point, and Wilmington.

North Dakota, Bismarck, Mandan, and Minot.

Oklahoma, Ardmore, Bartlesville, Duncan, El Reno, Enid, Miami, McAlester, Muskogee, Purcell, Sapulpa, Tulsa, Wagoner, Guthrie, and Oklahoma City.

Oregon, Baker City.

South Carolina, Columbia.

South Dakota, Dell Rapids, Huron, Pierre, Rapid City, Sioux Falls, Vermilion, Yankton, Aberdeen, Canton, and Chamberlain.

Tennessee, Memphis.

Texas, Aransas Pass, Austin, Beaumont, Corpus Christi, Port Arthur, Dallas, Denison, Fort Worth, Galveston, Greenville, Houston, Kenedy, Marble Falls, Marshall, Palestine, Port Lavaca, and Sherman.

Utah, Salt Lake City.

Washington, Spokane and Tacoma.

West Virginia, Bluefield, Huntington, and Parkersburg.

Wisconsin, Eau Claire and Appleton.

In Texas, among the cities, I call attention to Dallas, the largest city in the State; to Houston, Fort Worth, Galveston, and a large number of others.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will state in this connection that in New Jersey it has taken a strong hold of the people there. The city of Trenton, the capital of our State, has recently ratified it. It is now being agitated in the great city of Jersey City, in New Brunswick, Plainfield, and a number of other cities. It is taking a strong hold upon the people of New Jersey.

Mr. OWEN. I have thought it proper to submit this matter to the Senate because I think it deserves to have the attention of the country called to it as an agency for bringing about a restoration of honest government in this country. Our municipalities, and especially our great municipalities, have been most seriously afflicted by a partisan or bipartisan system of corrupt politics, of which the examples are too numerous to mention and some of them so egregious as to make it a serious humiliation to the American Republic. The condition which was exposed by Francis J. Heney and Rudolph Spreckels in San Francisco is a painful exhibition of it. Ben Linsay's disclosure of the conditions in Denver was equally bad. The disclosures of Joe Folk in St. Louis were just as striking and painful. In Pittsburg, where 116 men, including a large part of the city council, the legislative authority of that city, mercenaries who were engaged in a wholesale conspiracy to rob that city and the people of the city under the party and ward service in the governing business. The conditions in Harrisburg, Pa., the conditions in Philadelphia, in New York, in Albany, and in Boston furnish a like painful and sorrowful record.

I wish to say that this method of governing municipalities by the commission plan is not only adapted to villages and to towns, but to great cities, cities as large as New York City and Philadelphia, and the bigger the city the more efficient and valuable becomes the principle of governing the municipality by the commission plan, which concentrates power and makes those who exercise it responsible directly to the people under the initiative, referendum, and recall.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it apply to States? Why not apply it to States?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the system of a short ballot is capable of being applied to very large cities, and I think it might, under suitable modifications, be wisely applied to the governing business of States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then what would become of the constitution of a State, if you are going to substitute five men, with all of the powers of the legislative, judicial, and executive government?

Mr. OWEN. If the people of the State take charge of the governing function in the State of Idaho, or any other State, they will be able to govern it with efficiency and with wisdom, and without any fear of destroying government. I think it would be a good thing if the legislatures of the States were not so large. They are sometimes too large, and I know they would do better if they were subject to the initiative, referendum, and recall.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would five be sufficient?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator may determine from the size of his own State what he would regard as a sufficient number. I think it would be dependent upon the number of people to be found in any given State.

But I do not care to discuss a matter which is so remote from this. It is sufficient to call the attention of the country to the expediency of this method of administering the government of municipalities and its wonderful success where it has been tried, and I have done so for the purpose of promoting efficiency and honesty of government not only in cities, but in counties, States, and Nation. For it must be always remembered that a corrupt city boss uses his city machine to levy tribute on the county-machine managers, on the State-machine managers, and on the national-machine managers to demand public offices and legislative and administrative favor for himself and his commercial and political allies.

Mr. President, the great problem of the present time is the restoration of equality of opportunity, so that every man, every woman, and every child may receive and enjoy a fair return for labor honorably and faithfully performed; so that every human being can have an equal opportunity to enjoy the providences of God and the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

The only way that this equality of opportunity can be established is through genuine, real self-government of the people, by the people, for the people. Under actual self-government when the majority of the people are in power—the majority of the people will always refuse to grant special privileges to the few at the expense of the many; refuse to grant to the few the right to tax the many for the benefit of the few at the cost of the many.

It will not do to say that the people have self-government when in reality they are actually governed by machine politics; when under the mechanism of party management their governors, Congressmen, and Presidents are nominated by the delegated delegates in State conventions of delegated delegates in county conventions sent by ward and precinct caucuses manipulated by local bosses and their henchmen; where the machine under the mechanism of party management can nominate all public officials under a system which does not give to each citizen an equal opportunity, through the mandatory direct primary, safeguarded by law, to nominate public officers; where there is no thoroughgoing corrupt practices act to prevent the machine politicians from false registration, from stuffing the ballot box or stealing the elections, through a variety of fraudulent practices; where there is no system by which the people can recall crooked officials or veto laws which the people do not want, or initiate laws which the people do want, it is perfectly obvious to the most casual observer that the people do not rule, but are ruled by the mechanism of machine politics under the guidance of the so-called local, county, and State boss, because the machine is in control in a majority of States.

Of course in nominating the President or in nominating any other important officer, as a governor of a State, the machine will not dare to nominate a man who is incapable of standing a campaign. But it must always be remembered that all men, including public men, are influenced powerfully by their environment and political associations and affiliations, and that the great corporate monopolies of the country are fully aware of those whose predilections will enable them to be subjected to influences in the interest of big business.

It is not at all necessary to suggest that machine candidates are of necessity dishonest or even insincere. It is sufficient that they are subject to the domination or influence of special interests. In this event, the people are not in reality exercising the right to rule, but they are being ruled by nominees and candidates chosen against the interests of the people, and who would be greatly disliked by the people if the people really understood what to expect from them.

Self-government is through two main systems; either it is party government in combination with constitutional government or self-government solely through the constitutional form; that is, the direct rule of the people through constitutional forms, without having party government.

The great political problem of the age is, How can real self-government be reestablished in national affairs, and be reestablished in the States and in the towns and cities wherein as yet the people are still out of power?

The line of least resistance in reestablishing the self-government of the people is through the initiative and referendum by questioning candidates on this issue when the candidate is seeking votes. The ordinary candidate will not dare to refuse his promise to support the initiative and referendum when he is seeking to be nominated or elected, if vigorously questioned by organized bodies of voters. To do so is to ask the voters to support him as a lawmaker and at the same time to deny the people whose votes he solicits their right to initiate any law they do want or to veto any law they do not want. Few candidates have the hardihood to do this. No candidate can succeed in it where the people are in earnest in making the demand.

With the initiative and referendum established, so that the people can initiate any law they do want and veto any law they do not want, the next steps are easy—to establish a thoroughgoing, mandatory, direct primary, safeguarded by law, and to establish, also, a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act that will secure an honest registration law, faithfully administered, and will guarantee likewise elections free from bribery, coercion, and corruption. In this way self-government can be secured for the States as States.

For villages, towns, cities, and counties the answer is: Secure from the legislature the right to establish a system of government in which a small number of representatives—town or county commissioners—directly nominated, directly elected, and subject to recall, shall be directly chosen by the people, responsible to the people, and who shall be both the legislators and the executors of the public will. They will then conduct the governing business for the people. The name of the system is The Commission Form of Municipal Government. It may be easily adapted to counties and to States.

It completely establishes the self-government of the people, and will make it thoroughly efficient and honest.

COMMERCIALISM IN GOVERNMENT.

Commercialism has invaded the governing function. The administrative branches of the Government, the legislative branches of the Government, and even the judicial departments of Government are not free from its corrupting influence.

Commercialism has insinuated itself unfairly, unjustly, and corruptly into the governing function in counties, in towns, in cities, in States, and in the Nation.

Secret alliances have been entered into in innumerable counties, cities, and States between various special interests and the so-called partisan or bipartisan political machines.

These special interests have an infinite variety of forms. It may be a gas company desiring to monopolize the gas at a high rate in some city; it may be a traction company; it may be a water company; it may be a municipal-contract company dealing with the paving, sewerage, municipal buildings; it may be the Oil Trust, Tobacco Trust, or any of a thousand trusts in commerce, transportation, or public utilities; it may be any form of selfish interest or a combination of them.

It may be a combination of mere political mercenaries banded together to put themselves in office, inspired not by patriotism, not by desire to render public service, but banded together by the "cohesive power of public plunder."

The main point is that these special interests use the political machine as an agency through which they can promote their selfish interests at the expense of the general welfare.

CORRUPT MACHINE POLITICS MUST BE TERMINATED.

It is for this reason that machine politics must be overthrown and will be overthrown by the progressive movement, which stands for an honest registration act, an honest election law and secret ballot, a direct primary law, a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices prevention act, the initiative and referendum and recall, the commission form of government for cities, the publicity pamphlet, a strict civil service, for direct nomination of party delegates and of the presidential and vice presidential candidates, and so forth. By these processes the power of the political machine as an agency for corrupt government in the service of the special interests against the general welfare can be greatly abated and finally terminated.

It sometimes happens that even a political machine is in the hands of ambitious but upright men, who do not lose sight of honest government and may give the people a fairly satisfactory government, but the opportunities for corruption of government under this system is always open to the unscrupulous when men inspired alone by the general welfare grow weary, inattentive, and relax their vigilance. It is a bad system, defective, and full of pitfalls.

THE POLITICAL MACHINE.

Mr. President, legitimate organization of patriotic men to promote the policies of government in which they believe is highly commendable and meets with my cordial and warm approval. I have always been active myself in promoting and taking personal part in what I deemed legitimate political organization for patriotic purposes; but when legitimate party organization degenerates into a corrupt and corrupting political machine, led by mercenaries with sinister purposes, who get possession of the machinery of political organization, under color of intense devotion to the party service or of great zeal in promoting party doctrines, and resort to corrupt practices, it should be restrained and abated. When party knaves engage in false registration of voters, registering absentees, dead men, fictitious persons, and ghosts, and thereafter have such falsely registered electors impersonated at the polls and falsely vote them; when they stuff the ballot box with fictitious ballots; when their strikers mutilate the ballots of honest men to defeat the public will; when they make a false count of the registered votes; when they make false returns of the registered votes; when they steal the election by corrupt practices, coercing men who are unfortunate, poor, or dependent; when they bribe voters by the thousand, as they did in Adams and Scioto Counties, Ohio; and put unworthy allies into office and public power; when they enter into unholy alliance with sinister commercial interests to defeat the public will, to buy municipal councils, as they were exposed in doing in San Francisco, in Denver, in St. Louis, in Chicago, in Pittsburg, and in innumerable cities; when they and their office-holding allies enter into corrupt agreements with municipal contractors to defraud the people of the city in the building of streets, bridges, sewers, and waterworks; when they give away or convey for a trifling consideration valuable franchises belonging to the people of the cities, or the people of the States, or the people of the United States, through corrupt combinations of this character; when they nominate public officials, secretly pledged to serve special interests, by packing conventions in towns, cities, counties, and States; when these combinations nominate Members of Congress and procure the election of Senators by bribery and corrupt methods and practices as the servants of special interests, the time has come when an end shall be put to it by the people of the United States and the integrity of government be reestablished by the overthrow of such corrupt machines whether in city, State, or Nation.

The corrupt political machine is the chief agency through which special interests operate in the United States. Those desiring special privilege contribute large sums of money to the organized machine—to the local, the city, the State, or the national political "boss." They bring about the coercion of employees of corporations by tens of thousands for the support of machine rule. They furnish the means for bribery and corrupt practices and are paid back their investment by the machine or the boss at public expense—by county contracts, by municipal contracts, by laws they desire passed or laws they desire defeated, by immunity from law, by the law's delay, or by the appointment of various officials who administer the law, prosecuting attorneys, and even of judges on the bench who will interpret the law favorably to them.

It is extremely difficult for the ordinary citizen to uncover, expose, and punish these corrupt and corrupting processes.

Corrupting special interests will not hesitate to spend money for the purchase of seats on the floor of the Senate and to use other corrupt processes to unfairly influence legislators in the choice of Senators. When a Senator is to be elected every available pull on the individual member of the legislature is taken advantage of through the ambition, the interest, the selfishness, the weakness, or the affections and obligations of the individual member of the general assembly. Any member of the general assembly whose house is mortgaged, who has serious debts he can not meet, is thus capable of being subjected to such unfair pressure. It is for these reasons that the people of the United States demand election of Senators by direct vote of the people. It is for these reasons that Oregon and other States are adopting the people's rule system and the presidential-preference voting system, so that the citizens may deal directly with the nomination of a President. It is for these reasons that the people of this country are demanding direct primaries, so that they can select all candidates and party delegates, and explains the demand for the initiative and referendum, so that they can initiate the laws they do want and veto the laws they do not want. By the initiative system alone can they force through thoroughgoing corrupt-practices prevention acts in the several States over the heads of legislatures controlled by corrupt machines. It is for these reasons that the short ballot has been so widely advocated and so largely adopted in municipalities. It is for these reasons the people demanded improved methods of administering the business of the House of Representatives and relieving that body from machine methods, and it is for these reasons that a commission form of government for municipalities is so desired and so necessary.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a word. It is the most astonishing doctrine I have ever heard announced in a responsible tribunal or upon a responsible occasion, that the people, tiring of the exercise of the functions of self-government, should hire somebody to perform it for them. That is all it amounts to. You hire three or five men, giving them absolute power to name the judiciary and the executive officers, you pay them so much a year, and there is nobody above them to whom they are responsible. It is the most astonishing proposition of abandoning self-government that I have ever heard, and were there any foundation for it it would be a reflection on and impeachment of the American people that ought to discredit them in the eyes of all the nations of the earth.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, May 27, 1911.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to the inquiry by telephone of your secretary, I am sending you herewith a tabular statement of the urban and rural population of the United States, as printed in the census of 1900. The figures for 1910 are available as yet only for a few States, and from these no general statement could be made to-day which would be serviceable as indicative of conditions in the entire country. It is expected that the information relative to this matter will be fully tabulated next week, and I can arrange to have it sent to you when completed if at that time it would serve your purposes.

Very respectfully,

ROLAND P. FALKNER, Acting Director.

THE IOWA LAW.

[Passed by the General Assembly of Iowa, 1907, and amended, 1909. Adopted by the city of Des Moines, Iowa, at a special election held June 20, 1907. The election of the first council (commissioners) provided for in the act took place in March, 1908. The "plan" became operative April 1, 1908.]

An act to provide for the government of certain cities and the adoption thereof by special election "additional to Title V of the code." [Approved, Mar. 29, 1907, and as amended Mar. 30 and Apr. 16, 1909.]

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa:

SECTION 1. [Sec. 1056-a17. SUPPLEMENT TO THE CODE OF 1907—CITIES AFFECTED.] Cities having by the last preceding State or national census a population of 7,000 or over, including any such city acting under special charter, may become organized as a city under the provisions of this act by proceeding as hereinafter provided. [As amended, 1909.]

SEC. 2. [Sec. 1056-a18. PETITION—QUESTION SUBMITTED—RESULT CERTIFIED—ELECTION OF OFFICERS.] Upon petition of electors equal in number to 25 per cent of the votes cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding city election of any such city, the mayor shall, by proclamation, submit the question of organizing as a city under this act at a special election to be held at a time specified therein, and within two months after said petition is filed: Provided, however, That in case any city is located in two or more townships said petition shall be signed by 25 per cent of the qualified electors of said city residing in each of said townships. If said plan is not adopted at the special election called, the question of adopting said plan shall not be resubmitted to the voters of said city for adoption within two years thereafter, and then the questions to adopt shall be resubmitted upon the presentation of a petition signed by electors as hereinbefore provided, equal in number to 25 per cent of the votes cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding general city election. At such election the proposition to be submitted shall be "Shall the proposition to organize the city of (name the city), under chapter 14-c of the supplement to the code, 1907, as amended by the acts of the thirty-third general assembly, be adopted?" and the election thereupon shall be conducted, the vote canvassed, and the result declared in the same manner as provided by law in respect to other city elections. If the majority of the votes cast shall be in favor thereof, cities having a population of 25,000 and over shall thereupon proceed to the election of a mayor and four councilmen, and cities having a population of 7,000 and less than 25,000 shall proceed to the election of a mayor and two councilmen, as hereinafter provided. Immediately after such proposition is adopted the mayor shall transmit to the governor, to the secretary of state, and to the county auditor each a certificate stating that such proposition was adopted. At the next regular city election after the adoption of such proposition there shall be elected a mayor and councilmen. In the event, however, that the next regular city election does not occur within one year after such special election the mayor shall, within 10 days after such special election, by proclamation, call a special election for the election of a mayor and councilmen, 60 days' notice thereof being given in such call, such election in either case to be conducted as hereinafter provided. [As amended, 1909.]

SEC. 3. [Sec. 1056-a19. STATUTES APPLICABLE—EXISTING ORDINANCES, RESOLUTIONS, ETC.] All laws governing cities of the first and second class [as amended, 1909] and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and sections 955, 956, 959, 964, 989, 1000, 1023, and 1053 of the code now applicable to special-charter cities and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall apply to and govern cities organized under this act. All by-laws, ordinances, and resolutions lawfully passed and in force in any such city under its former organization shall remain in force until altered or repealed by the council elected under the provisions of this act. The territorial limits of such city shall remain the same as under its former organization, and all rights and property of every description which were vested in any city under its former organization shall vest in the same under the organization herein contemplated, and no right or liability either in favor of or against it, existing at the time, and no suit or prosecution of any kind shall be affected by such change, unless otherwise provided for in this act. [As amended, 1909.]

SEC. 4. [Sec. 1056-a20. ELECTIVE OFFICERS—VACANCIES—TERMS OF OFFICE.] In every city having a population of 25,000 and over there shall be elected at the regular biennial municipal election a mayor and four councilmen, and in every city having a population of 7,000 and less than 25,000 there shall be elected at such election a mayor and two councilmen. [As amended, 1909.]

If any vacancy occurs in any such office, the remaining members of said council shall appoint a person to fill such vacancy during the balance of the unexpired term.

Said officers shall be nominated and elected at large. Said officers shall qualify and their terms of office shall begin on the first Monday after their election. The terms of office of the mayor and councilmen or aldermen in such city in office at the beginning of the terms of office of the mayor and councilmen first elected under the provisions of this act shall then cease and determine, and the terms of office of all other appointive officers in force in such city, except as hereinafter provided, shall cease and determine as soon as the council shall by resolution declare.

SEC. 5. [Sec. 1056-a21. CANDIDATES—HOW NOMINATED—PRIMARY ELECTION—BALLOT—CANVASS OF VOTES—RESULT PUBLISHED—MUNICIPAL ELECTION.] Candidates to be voted for at all general municipal elections at which a mayor and councilmen are to be elected under the provisions of this act shall be nominated by a primary election, and no other names shall be placed upon the general ballot except those selected in the manner hereinafter prescribed. The primary election for such nomination shall be held on the second Monday preceding the general municipal election. The judges of election appointed for the general municipal election shall be the judges of the primary election, and it shall be held at the same place, so far as possible, and the polls shall be opened and closed at the same hours, with the same clerks as are required for said general municipal election. Any person desiring to become a candidate for mayor or councilman shall, at least 10 days prior to said primary election, file with the said clerk a statement of such candidacy, in substantially the following form:

STATE OF IOWA, ——— County, ss:

I, ——— ———, being first duly sworn, say that I reside at ——— Street, city of ———, county of ———, State of Iowa; that I am a qualified voter therein; that I am a candidate for nomination to the office of (mayor or councilman), to be voted upon at the primary election to be held on the ——— Monday of ———, 19—, and I hereby request that my name be printed upon the official primary ballot for nomination by such primary election for such office.

(Signed) ——— ———

Subscribed and sworn to (or affirmed) before me by ——— on this —— day of ———, 19—.

(Signed) ——— ———, and shall at the same time file therewith the petition of at least 25 qualified voters requesting such candidacy. Each petition shall be verified by one or more persons as to the qualifications and residence, with street number, of each of the persons so signing the said petition, and the said petition shall be in substantially the following form:

Petition accompanying nominating statement.

The undersigned, duly qualified electors of the city of ——— and residing at the places set opposite our respective names hereto, do hereby request that the name of (name of candidate) be placed on the ballot as a candidate for nomination for (name of office) at the primary election to be held in such city on the ——— Monday of ———, 19—. We further state that we know him to be a qualified elector of said city and a man of good moral character and qualified in our judgment for the duties of such office.

Names of qualified electors.	Number.	Street.

Immediately upon the expiration of the time of filing the statements and petition for candidacies the said city clerk shall cause to be published for three successive days in all the daily newspapers published in the city, in the proper form, the names of the persons as they are to appear upon the primary ballot, and if there be no daily newspaper, then in two issues of any other newspapers that may be published in said city; and the said clerk shall thereupon cause the primary ballots to be printed, authenticated with a facsimile of his signature. Upon the said ballot the names of the candidates for mayor, arranged alphabetically, shall first be placed, with a square at the left of each name, and immediately below the words, "Vote for one." Following these names, likewise arranged in alphabetical order, shall appear the names of the candidates for councilmen, with a square at the left of each name, and below the names of such candidates shall appear the words, "Vote for four," or "Vote for two," as the case may be. The ballot shall be printed upon plain, substantial, white paper, and shall be headed:

"Candidates for nomination for mayor and councilmen of ——— city at the primary election," but shall have no party designation or mark whatever. The ballots shall be in substantially the following form:

(Place a cross in the square preceding the names of the parties you favor as candidates for the respective positions.)

OFFICIAL PRIMARY BALLOT.

Candidates for nomination for mayor and councilmen of ——— city at the primary election.

For Mayor.

(Name of Candidate.)

(Vote for one.)

(For Councilman.)

(Name of Candidate.)

(Vote for four) or (vote for two) as the case may be.

Official ballot attest:

City Clerk.

Having caused said ballots to be printed, the said city clerk shall cause to be delivered at each polling place a number of said ballots equal to twice the number of votes cast in such polling precinct at the last general municipal election for mayor. The persons who are qualified to vote at the general municipal election shall be qualified to vote at such primary election, and challenges can be made by not more than two persons, to be appointed at the time of opening the polls by the judges of election; and the law applicable to challenges at a general municipal election shall be applicable to challenges made at such primary election. Judges of election shall, immediately upon the closing of the polls, count the ballots and ascertain the number of votes cast in such precinct for each of the candidates, and make return thereof to the city clerk upon proper blanks to be furnished by the said clerk within six hours of the closing of the polls. On the day following the said primary election the said city clerk shall canvass said returns so received from all the polling precincts, and shall make and publish in all the newspapers of said city, at least once, the result thereof. Said canvass by the city clerk shall be publicly made. The two candidates receiving the highest number of votes for mayor shall be the candidates, and the only candidates, whose names shall be placed upon the ballot for mayor at the next succeeding general municipal election, and in cities having a population of 25,000 and over the eight candidates receiving the highest number of votes for councilman, or all such candidates if less than eight, and in cities having a population of 7,000 and less than 25,000 the four candidates receiving the highest number of votes for councilman, or all such candidates if less than four, shall be the candidates, and the only candidates, whose names shall be placed upon the ballot for councilman at such municipal election. All electors of cities under this act who by the laws governing cities of the first and second class and cities acting under special charter would be entitled to vote for the election of officers at any general municipal election in such cities shall be qualified to vote at all elections under this act; and the ballot at such general municipal election shall be in the same general form as for such primary election, so far as applicable, and in all elections in such city the election precinct, voting places, method of conducting election, canvassing the vote, and announcing the results shall be the same as by law provided for election of officers in such cities, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act. [As amended, 1909.]

SEC. 5-A. [Sec. 1056-a22. SERVICES FOR HIRE—PENALTY.] Any person who shall agree to perform any services in the interest of any candidate for any office provided in this act, in consideration of any money or other valuable thing for such services performed in the interest of any candidate, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $300, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding 30 days.

SEC. 5-B. [Sec. 1056-a23. BRIBERY AND ILLEGAL VOTING—PENALTY.] Any person offering a bribe, either in money or other consideration, to any elector for the purpose of influencing his vote at any election provided in this act, or any elector entitled to vote at any such election receiving and accepting such bribe or other consideration; any person making false answer to any of the provisions of this act relative to his qualifications to vote at said election; any person willfully voting or offering to vote at such election who has not been a resident of this State for six months next preceding said election, or who is not 21 years of age, or is not a citizen of the United States, or knowing himself not to be a qualified elector of such precinct where he offers to vote; any person knowingly procuring, aiding, or abetting any violation hereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined a sum not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be imprisoned in the county jail not less than 10 nor more than 90 days.

SEC. 6. [Sec. 1056-a24. COUNCIL—QUORUM—MAYOR TO PRESIDE.] Every city having a population of 25,000 and over shall be governed by a council consisting of the mayor and 4 councilmen, and every city having a population of 7,000 and less than 25,000 shall be governed by a council consisting of the mayor and 2 councilmen, chosen as provided in this act, each of whom shall have the right to vote on all questions coming before the council. In cities having 4 councilmen 3 members of the council shall constitute a quorum, and in cities having 2 councilmen 2 members of the council shall constitute a quorum, and in cities having 4 councilmen the affirmative vote of 3 members, and in cities having 2 councilmen the affirmative vote of 2 members shall be necessary to adopt any motion, resolution, or ordinance or pass any measure, unless a greater number is provided for in this act. [As amended, 1909.]

Upon every vote the yeas and nays shall be called and recorded, and every motion, resolution, or ordinance shall be reduced to writing and read before the vote is taken thereon. The mayor shall preside at all meetings of the council; he shall have no power to veto any measure, but every resolution or ordinance passed by the council must be signed by the mayor or by two councilmen and be recorded before the same shall be in force.

SEC. 7. [Sec. 1056-a25. COUNCIL—POWERS AND DUTIES—DEPARTMENTS.] The council shall have and possess and the council and its members shall exercise all executive, legislative, and judicial powers and duties now had, possessed, and exercised by the mayor, city council, solicitor, assessor, treasurer, auditor, city engineer, and other executive and administrative officers in cities of the first and second class, and in cities under special charter, and shall also possess and exercise all executive, legislative, and judicial powers and duties now had and exercised by the board of public works, park commissioners, the board of police and fire commissioners, board of waterworks trustees, and board of library trustees in all cities wherein a board of public works, park commissioners, board of police and fire commissioners, board of waterworks trustees, and board of library trustees now exist or may be hereafter created. [As amended, 1909.]

The executive and administrative powers, authority, and duties in such cities shall be distributed into and among five departments, as follows:

1. Department of public affairs.
2. Department of accounts and finance.
3. Department of public safety.
4. Department of streets and public improvements.
5. Department of parks and public property.

The council shall determine the powers and duties to be performed by and assign them to the appropriate department; shall prescribe the powers and duties of officers and employees; may assign particular officers and employees to one or more of the departments; may require an officer or employee to perform duties in two or more departments; and may make such other rules and regulations as may be necessary or proper for the efficient and economical conduct of the business of the city.

SEC. 8. [Sec. 1056-a26. DEPARTMENT SUPERINTENDENTS, OFFICERS, AND ASSISTANTS.] The mayor shall be superintendent of the department of public affairs, and the council shall at the first regular meeting after election of its members designate by majority vote one councilman to be superintendent of the department of accounts and finances; one to be superintendent of the department of public safety; one to be superintendent of the department of street and public improvements; and one to be superintendent of the department of parks and public property: Provided, however, That in cities having a population of less than 25,000 there shall be designated to each councilman two of said departments. Such designation shall be changed whenever it appears that the public service would be benefited thereby. The council shall, at said first meeting or as soon as practicable thereafter, elect by majority vote the following officers: A city clerk, solicitor, assessor, treasurer, auditor, civil engineer, city physician, marshal, chief of fire department, market master, street commissioner, three library trustees, and such other officers and assistants as shall be provided for by ordinance and necessary to the proper and efficient conduct of the affairs of the city: Provided, however, That in cities having a population of less than 25,000 such only of the above-named officers shall be appointed as may, in the judgment of the mayor and councilmen, be necessary for the proper and efficient transaction of the affairs of the city. In those cities of the first class not having a superior court the council shall appoint a police judge. In cities of the second class not having a superior court the mayor shall hold police court, as now provided by law. Any officer or assistant elected or appointed by the council may be removed from office at any time by a vote of a majority of the members of the council, except as otherwise provided for in this act. [As amended, 1909.]

SEC. 9. [Sec. 1056-a27. POWER TO CREATE AND DISCONTINUE OFFICES.] The council shall have power from time to time to create, fill, and discontinue offices and employments other than herein prescribed, according to their judgment of the needs of the city, and may by majority vote of all the members remove any such officer or employee, except as otherwise provided for in this act, and may, by resolution or otherwise, prescribe, limit, or change the compensation of such officers or employees.

SEC. 10. [Sec. 1056-a28. OFFICE IN CITY HALL—SALARIES.] The mayor and councilmen shall have an office at the city hall, and their total compensation shall be as follows: In cities having by the last preceding State or national census a population of 7,000 and less than 10,000 the mayor's annual salary shall be $600 and each councilman $450. In cities having by such census a population of 10,000 and less than 15,000 the mayor's annual salary shall be $1,200 and each councilman $900. In cities having by such census a population of 15,000 and less than 25,000 the mayor's annual salary shall be $1,500 and each councilman $1,200. In cities having by such census a population of 25,000 and less than 40,000 the mayor's annual salary shall be $2,500 and each councilman $1,800. In cities having by such census a population of 40,000 and less than 60,000 the mayor's annual salary shall be $3,000 and each councilman $2,500, and in cities having by such census a population of 60,000 or more the mayor's annual salary shall be $3,500 and that of councilman $3,000. [As amended, 1909.]

Any increase in salary occasioned under the provisions of this scale by increase in population in any city shall commence with the month next after the official publication of the census showing such increase therein.

Every other officer or assistant shall receive such salary or compensation as the council shall by ordinance provide, payable in equal monthly installments.

The salary or compensation of all other employees of such city shall be fixed by the council and shall be payable monthly or at such shorter periods as the council shall determine.

SEC. 11. [Sec. 1056–a29. MEETINGS—PRESIDENT OF COUNCIL—VICE PRESIDENT.] Regular meetings of the council shall be held on the first Monday after the election of councilmen, and thereafter at least once each month. The council shall provide by ordinance for the time of holding regular meetings, and special meetings may be called from time to time by the mayor or two councilmen. All meetings of the council, whether regular or special, at which any person not a city officer is admitted shall be open to the public.

The mayor shall be president of the council and preside at its meetings, and shall supervise all departments and report to the council for its action all matters requiring attention in either. The superintendent of the department of accounts and finances shall be vice president of the council, and in case of vacancy in the office of mayor, or the absence or inability of the mayor, shall perform the duties of the mayor.

SEC. 12. [Sec. 1056–a30. ORDINANCES AND RESOLUTIONS—FRANCHISES.] Every ordinance or resolution appropriating money or ordering any street improvement or sewer, or making or authorizing the making of any contract, or granting any franchise or right to occupy or use the streets, highways, bridges, or public places in the city for any purpose, shall be complete in the form in which it is finally passed, and remain on file with the city clerk for public inspection at least one week before the final passage or adoption thereof. No franchise or right to occupy or use the streets, highways, bridges, or public places in any city shall be granted, renewed, or extended except by ordinance, and every franchise or grant for interurban or street railways, gas or water works, electric light or power plants, heating plants, telegraph or telephone systems, or other public-service utilities within said city must be authorized or approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon at a general or special election, as provided in section 776 of the code.

SEC. 13. [Sec. 1056–a31. OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES—WHAT PROHIBITED.] No officer or employee elected or appointed in any such city shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract or job for work or materials, or the profits thereof, or services to be furnished or performed for the city; and no such officer or employee shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract or job for work or materials, or the profits thereof, or services to be furnished or performed for any person, firm, or corporation operating interurban railway, street railway, gas works, waterworks, electric light or power plant, heating plant, telegraph line, telephone exchange, or other public utility within the territorial limits of said city. No such officer or employee shall accept or receive, directly or indirectly, from any person, firm, or corporation operating within the territorial limits of said city any interurban railway, street railway, gas works, waterworks, electric light or power plant, heating plant, telegraph line or telephone exchange, or other business using or operating under a public franchise, any frank, free ticket, or free service, or accept or receive, directly or indirectly, from any such person, firm, or corporation any other service upon terms more favorable than is granted to the public generally. Any violation of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor, and every such contract or agreement shall be void.

Such prohibition of free transportation shall not apply to policemen or firemen in uniform; nor shall any free service to city officials heretofore provided by any franchise or ordinance be affected by this section. Any officer or employee of such city who, by solicitation or otherwise, shall exert his influence directly or indirectly to influence other officers or employees of such city to adopt his political views or to favor any particular person or candidate for office, or who shall in any manner contribute money, labor, or other valuable thing to any person for election purposes, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 30 days.

SEC. 14 [Sec. 1056–a32. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSIONERS—DUTIES—POWERS OF COUNCIL].—In cities having a population of 25,000 and over the council shall, and in cities having a population of 7,000 and less than 25,000 the council may, immediately after organizing, by ordinance appoint three civil service commissioners, who shall hold office, one until the first Monday in April of the second year after his appointment, one until the first Monday in April of the fourth year after his appointment, and one until the first Monday in April of the sixth year after his appointment: Provided, however, That in all cases in which no civil service commissioners are appointed by the council the council shall have the same powers and shall exercise and perform all the duties devolving upon such commissioners as provided for in this act. In cities wherein civil service commissioners have been appointed under the provisions of this act each succeeding council shall, as soon as practicable after organizing, appoint one commissioner for six years, who shall take the place of the commissioner whose term of office expires. [As amended, 1909.]

The chairman of the commission for each biennial period shall be the member whose term first expires. No person while on the said commission shall hold or be a candidate for any office of public trust. Two of said members shall constitute a quorum to transact business. The commissioners must be citizens of Iowa and residents of the city for more than three years next preceding their appointment.

The council may remove any of said commissioners during their term of office for cause, four councilmen voting in favor of such removal, and shall fill any vacancy that may occur in said commission for the unexpired term. The city council shall provide suitable rooms in which the said civil service commission may hold its meetings. They shall have a clerk, who shall keep a record of all its meetings, such city to supply the said commission with all necessary equipment to properly attend to such business.

(a) Oath of office.—Before entering upon the duties of their office, each of said commissioners shall take and subscribe an oath, which shall be filed and kept in the office of the city clerk, to support the Constitution of the United States and the State of Iowa, and to obey the laws, and to aim to secure and maintain an honest and efficient force, free from partisan distinction or control, and to perform the duties of his office to the best of his ability.

(b) Examinations—Results certified.—Said commission shall, on the first Monday of April and October of each year, or oftener if it shall be deemed necessary, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the council, hold examinations for the purpose of determining the qualifications of applicants for positions, which examination shall be practical and shall fairly test the fitness of the persons examined to discharge the duties of the position to which they seek to be appointed. Said commission shall as soon as possible after such examination certify to the council double the number of persons necessary to fill vacancies, who, according to its records, have the highest standing for the position they seek to fill as a result of such examination, and all vacancies which occur, that come under the civil service, prior to the date of the next regular examination, shall be filled from said list so certified: Provided, however, That should the list for any cause be reduced to less than three for any division, then the council or the head of the proper department may temporarily fill a vacancy, but not to exceed 30 days.

(c) Removals and discharges—Appeal.—All persons subject to such civil-service examinations shall be subject to removal from office or employment by the council for misconduct or failure to perform their duties under such rules and regulations as it may adopt, and the chief of police, chief of the fire department, or any superintendent or foreman in charge of municipal work, may peremptorily suspend or discharge any subordinate then under his direction for neglect of duty or disobedience of his orders, but shall, within 24 hours thereafter, report such suspension or discharge, and the reason therefor, to the superintendent of his department, who shall thereupon affirm or revoke such discharge or suspension, according to the facts.

Such employee (or the officer who discharged or suspended him) may, within five days of such ruling, appeal therefrom to the council, which shall fully hear and determine the matter.

(d) Witnesses—Annual report—Rules and regulations.—The council shall have the power to enforce the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and papers, and power to administer oaths in the same manner and with like effect, and under the same penalties, as in the case of magistrates exercising criminal or civil jurisdiction under the statutes of Iowa.

Said commissioners shall make annual report to the council, and it may require a special report from said commission at any time; and said council may prescribe such rules and regulations for the proper conduct of the business of the said commission as shall be found expedient and advisable, including restrictions on appointment, promotions, removals for cause, roster of employees, certification of records to the auditor, and restrictions on payment to persons improperly employed.

(e) Penalties.—The council of such city shall have power to pass ordinances imposing suitable penalties for the punishment of persons violating any of the provisions of this act relating to the civil service commission.

(f) Officers and employees affected.—The provisions of this section shall apply to all appointive officers and employees of such city, except those especially named in section 8 of this act, commissioners of any kind (laborers whose occupation requires no special skill or fitness), election officials, and mayor's secretary and assistant solicitor, where such officers are appointed: Provided, however, That existing employees heretofore appointed or employed after competitive examination or for long service under the provisions of chapter 31, acts of the twenty-ninth general assembly, and subsequent amendments thereto, shall retain their positions without further examination unless removed for cause.

All officers and employees in any such city shall be elected or appointed with reference to their qualifications and fitness and for the good of the public service, and without reference to their political faith or party affiliations.

It shall be unlawful for any candidate for office, or any officer in any such city, directly or indirectly, to give or promise any person or persons any office, position, employment, benefit, or anything of value, for the purpose of influencing or obtaining the political support, aid, or vote of any person or persons.

Every elective officer in any such city shall, within 30 days after qualifying, file with the city clerk and publish at least once in a daily newspaper of general circulation his sworn statement of all his election and campaign expenses, and by whom such funds were contributed.

Any violation of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor and be a ground for removal from office.

SEC. 15. [Sec. 1056–a33. MONTHLY ITEMIZED STATEMENT—ANNUAL EXAMINATION.] The council shall each month print in pamphlet form a detailed itemized statement of all receipts and expenses of the city and a summary of its proceedings during the preceding month, and furnish printed copies thereof to the State library, the city library, the daily newspapers of the city, and to persons who shall apply therefor at the office of the city clerk. At the end of each year the council shall cause a full and complete examination of all the books and accounts of the city to be made by competent accountants, and shall publish the result of such examination in the manner above provided for publication of statements of monthly expenditures.

SEC. 16. [1056–a34. APPROPRIATIONS.] If, at the beginning of the term of office of the first council elected in such city under the provisions of this act, the appropriations for the expenditures of the city government for the current fiscal year have been made, said council shall have power, by ordinance, to revise, to repeal, or change said appropriations and to make additional appropriations.

SEC. 17. [1056–a35. TERMS DEFINED.] In the construction of this act the following rules shall be observed, unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent or repugnant to the context of the statute:

1. The words "councilman" or "alderman" shall be construed to mean "councilman" when applied to cities under this act.

2. When an office or officer is named in any law referred to in this act, it shall, when applied to cities under this act, be construed to mean the office or officer having the same functions or duties under the provisions of this act, or under ordinances passed under authority thereof.

3. The word "franchise" shall include every special privilege in the streets, highways, and public places of the city, whether granted by the State or the city, which does not belong to the citizens generally by common right.

4. The word "electors" shall be construed to mean persons qualified to vote for elective offices at regular municipal elections.

SEC. 18. [1056–a36. REMOVAL OF ELECTIVE OFFICERS—PROCEDURE—ELECTION OF SUCCESSORS.] The holder of any elective office may be removed at any time by the electors qualified to vote for a successor of such incumbent. The procedure to effect the removal of an incumbent of an elective office shall be as follows: A petition signed by electors entitled to vote for a successor to the incumbent sought to be removed, equal in number to at least 25 per cent of the entire vote for all candidates for the office of mayor at the last preceding general municipal election, demanding an election of a successor of the person sought to be removed shall be filed with the city clerk, which petition shall contain a general statement of the grounds for which the removal is sought. The signatures to the petition need not all be appended to one paper, but each signer shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the street and number. One of the signers of each such paper shall make oath before an officer competent to administer oaths that the statements therein made are true as he believes, and that each signature to the paper appended is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be. Within 10 days from the date of filing such petition the city clerk shall examine and from the voters' register ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and, if necessary, the council shall allow him extra help for that purpose, and he shall attach to said petition his certificate, showing the result of said examination. If by the clerk's certificate the petition is shown to be insufficient, it may be amended within 10 days from the date of said certificate. The clerk shall, within 10 days after such amendment, make like examination of the amended petition, and if his certificate shall show the same to be insufficient it shall be returned to the person filing the same, without prejudice, however, to the filing of a new petition to the same effect. If the petition shall be deemed to be sufficient the clerk shall submit the same to the council without delay. If the petition shall be found to be sufficient the council shall order and fix a date for holding the said election, not less than 30 days or more than 40 days from the date of the clerk's certificate to the council that a sufficient petition is filed.

The council shall make, or cause to be made, publication of notice and all arrangements for holding such election, and the same shall be conducted, returned, and the result thereof declared, in all respects as are other city elections.

So far as applicable, except as otherwise herein provided, nominations hereunder shall be made without the intervention of a primary election by filing with the clerk at least 10 days prior to said election, a statement of candidacy accompanied by a petition signed by electors entitled to vote at said special election equal in number to at least 10 per cent of the entire vote for all candidates for the office of mayor at the last preceding general municipal election, which said statement of candidacy and petition shall be substantially in the form set out in section 1056–a21 of the supplement to the code, 1907, so far as the same is applicable, substituting the word "special" for the word "primary" in such statement and petition, and stating therein that such person is a candidate for election instead of nomination.

The ballot for such special election shall be in substantially the following form:

(Official ballot.)

Special election for the balance of the unexpired term of ——— ——— as ——— ———.

For ——— ———.
(Vote for one only.)
(Names of candidates.)
——— ———
——— ———

Name of present incumbent.
Official ballot attest:
(Signature) ——— ———
City Clerk.

The successor of any officer so removed shall hold office during the unexpired term of his predecessor. Any person sought to be removed may be a candidate to succeed himself, and unless he requests otherwise in writing, the clerk shall place his name on the official ballot without nomination. In any such removal election the candidate receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected. At such election if some other person than the incumbent receives the highest number of votes the incumbent shall thereupon be deemed removed from the office upon qualification of his successor. In case the party who receives the highest number of votes shall fail to qualify, within 10 days after receiving notification of election, the office shall be deemed vacant. If the incumbent receives the highest number of votes he shall continue in office. The same method of removal shall be cumulative and additional to the methods heretofore provided by law. (As amended, 1909.)

SEC. 19. [Sec. 1056–37. PETITIONS FOR ORDINANCES—ADOPTION OR SUBMISSION—HOW REPEALED OR AMENDED.] Any proposed ordinance may be submitted to the council by petition signed by electors of the city equal in number to the percentage hereinafter required. The signatures, verification, authentication, inspection, certification, amendment, and submission of such petition shall be the same as provided for petitions under section 18 hereof.

If the petition accompanying the proposed ordinance be signed by electors equal in number to 25 per cent of the votes cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding general election, and contains a request that the said ordinance be submitted to a vote of the people if not passed by the council, such council shall either—

(a) Pass said ordinance without alteration within 20 days after attachment of the clerk's certificate to the accompanying petition, or

(b) Forthwith after the clerk shall attach to the petition accompanying such ordinance his certificate of sufficiency, the council shall call a special election, unless a general municipal election is fixed within 90 days thereafter, and at such special or general municipal election, if one is so fixed, such ordinance shall be submitted without alteration to the vote of the electors of said city.

But if the petition is signed by not less than 10 nor more than 25 per cent of the electors, as above defined, then the council shall, within 20 days, pass said ordinance without change, or submit the same at the next general city election occurring not more than 30 days after the clerk's certificate of sufficiency is attached to said petition.

The ballots used when voting upon said ordinance shall contain these words: "For the ordinance" (stating the nature of the proposed ordinance), and "Against the ordinance" (stating the nature of the proposed ordinance). If a majority of the qualified electors voting on the proposed ordinance shall vote in favor thereof, such ordinance shall thereupon become a valid and binding ordinance of the city; and any ordinance proposed by petition, or which shall be adopted by a vote of the people, can not be repealed or amended except by a vote of the people.

Any number of proposed ordinances may be voted upon at the same election, in accordance with the provisions of this section; but there shall not be more than one special election in any period of six months for such purpose.

The council may submit a proposition for the repeal of any such ordinance or for amendments thereto, to be voted upon at any succeeding general city election; and should such proposition so submitted receive a majority of the votes cast thereon at such election, such ordinance shall thereby be repealed or amended accordingly. Whenever any ordinance or proposition is required by this act to be submitted to the voters of the city at any election, the city clerk shall cause such ordinance or proposition to be published once in each of the daily newspapers published in said city; such publication to be not more than 20 or less than 5 days before the submission of such proposition or ordinance to be voted on.

SEC. 20. [Sec. 1056–a38. ORDINANCES—WHEN EFFECTIVE—PETITIONS OF PROTEST.] No ordinance passed by the council, except when otherwise required by the general laws of the State or by the provisions of this act, except an ordinance for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, which contains a statement of its urgency and is passed by a two-thirds vote of the council shall go into effect before 10 days from the time of its final passage; and if during said 10 days a petition signed by electors of the city equal in number to at least 25 per cent of the entire vote cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding general municipal election at which a mayor was elected, protesting against the passage of such ordinance, be presented to the council, the same shall thereupon be suspended from going into operation, and it shall be the duty of the council to reconsider such ordinance; and if the same is not entirely repealed, the council shall submit the ordinance, as is provided by subsection b of section 19 of this act, to the vote of the electors of the city, either at the general election or at a special municipal election to be called for that purpose; and such ordinance shall not go into effect or become operative unless a majority of the qualified electors voting on the same shall vote in favor thereof. Said petition shall be in all respects in accordance with the provisions of said section 19, except as to the percentage of signers, and be examined and certified to by the clerk in all respects as therein provided.

SEC. 21. [Sec. 1056–a39. ABANDONMENT OF COMMISSION PLAN OF GOVERNMENT.] Any city which shall have operated for more than six years under the provisions of this act may abandon such organization hereunder and accept the provisions of the general law of the State then applicable to cities of its population, or if now organized under special charter, may resume said special charter by proceeding as follows:

Upon the petition of not less than 25 per cent of the electors of such city a special election shall be called, at which the following proposition only shall be submitted: "Shall the city of (name of city) abandon its organization under chapter 14–c of the supplement of the code, 1907, as amended by the acts of the thirty-third general assembly, and become a city under the general law governing cities, or if now organized under special charter shall resume said special charter?"

If a majority of the votes cast at such special election be in favor of such proposition the officers elected at the next succeeding biennial election shall be those then prescribed by the general law of the State for cities of like population, and upon the qualification of such officers such city shall become a city under such general law of the State; but such change shall not in any manner or degree affect the property, right, or liabilities of any nature of such city, but shall merely extend to such change in its form of government.

The sufficiency of such petition shall be determined, the election ordered and conducted, and the results declared, generally as provided by section 18 of this act, in so far as the provisions thereof are applicable.

SEC. 22. [Sec. 1056–a40. PETITIONS.] Petitions provided for in this act shall be signed by none but legal voters of the city. Each petition shall contain, in addition to the names of the petitioners, the street and house number in which the petitioner resides, his age, and length of residence in the city. It shall also be accompanied by the affidavit of one or more legal voters of the city stating that the signers thereof were, at the time of signing, legal voters of said city, and the number of signers at the time the affidavit was made.

SEC. 23. This act, being deemed of immediate importance, shall take effect and be in force from and after its publication in the Register and Leader and Des Moines Capital, newspapers published in Des Moines, Iowa.

Approved March 29, A. D. 1907.

EXHIBIT C.

ORDINANCE UNDER WHICH THE FIRST ADMINISTRATION OF DES MOINES, IOWA, WAS ORGANIZED.

An ordinance to distribute the executive and administrative powers, authority, and duties into and among the several departments, and determine the powers and duties to be performed, and assign them to the appropriate departments and officers.

[Passed July 6, 1908.]

Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Des Moines:

SECTION 1. That the executive and administrative powers, authority, and duties in the city are distributed into and among the several departments, and the powers and duties to be performed are determined and assigned to the appropriate departments and officers, all as hereinafter set forth.

THE COUNCIL.

SEC. 2. The council has and shall exercise all legislative powers, functions, and duties conferred upon the city or its officers. It shall make all orders for the doing of work or the making or construction of any improvement, bridge, or building. It shall levy all taxes, apportion and appropriate all funds, and audit and allow all bills, accounts, pay rolls, and claims, and order payment thereof. It shall make all assessments for the cost of street improvements, sidewalks, sewers, and other work, improvement, or repairs which may be specially assessed. It shall make or authorize the making of all contracts, and no contract shall bind or be obligatory upon the city unless either made by ordinance or resolution adopted by the council, or reduced to writing and approved by the council, or expressly authorized by ordinance or resolution adopted by the council. All contracts and all ordinances and resolutions making contracts or authorizing the making of contracts shall be drawn by the corporation counsel or city solicitor, or approved by such officer, before the same is made or passed. All superintendents of departments and officers are the agents of the council only, and all their acts shall be subject to review and to approval or revocation by the council. Every superintendent or officer shall, from time to time, as required by law or ordinance, or when requested by the council, or whenever he shall deem necessary for the good of the public service, report to the council in writing respecting the business of the department or office or matters connected therewith.

The council may, by ordinance or resolution, assign to a superintendent, officer, or employee duties in respect to the business of any other department, office, or employment, and such service shall be rendered without additional compensation.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

SEC. 3. The mayor shall have and exercise all the powers and perform all the duties provided or prescribed by law or the ordinances of the city, not in conflict with the provisions of this ordinance. The mayor shall be superintendent of the department of public affairs, and as such shall have general supervision and oversight over all departments and offices in the city; he shall be the chief executive officer and representative of the city, shall sign all contracts on behalf of the city, and shall have charge of and cause to be prepared and published all statements and reports required by law or ordinance or by resolution of the council. The mayor shall be chairman of the local board of health; shall possess all of the powers and perform all of the duties pertaining to the local board of health, as is now or may hereafter be required by the laws of the State and the ordinances of the city. All notices of quarantine and release must bear his signature.

The corporation counsel, city solicitor, and assistant city solicitor, city stenographer, and other officers and employees of the legal department, the police court, the police judge, and clerk of police court, the city library and library building, and library trustees and other officers and employees in the library; the civil-service commission and all other officers or functionaries not by law or ordinance distributed or assigned to some other department are distributed and assigned to the department of public affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF ACCOUNTS AND FINANCE.

SEC. 4. The superintendent of the department of accounts and finance shall have charge of and supervision over all accounts and records of the city, and all officers, boards, or departments required to keep or make accounts, records, or reports. He shall inspect or cause to be inspected all records of accounts required to be kept in any of the offices or departments of the city, and shall cause proper accounts and records to be kept and proper reports to be made. He shall audit or cause to be audited at frequent intervals the accounts of every officer or employee who does or may disburse money. He shall have charge of the purchase, care, and distribution of all supplies and other articles not otherwise provided by law. He shall have charge and supervision over all printing by or for the city, unless otherwise provided by law. He shall examine, or cause to be examined, and report to the council upon all bills, accounts, pay rolls, and claims before they are acted upon or allowed, unless otherwise provided by law.

The assessor, auditor, treasurer, license collector, city clerk (by a later ordinance the city clerk was transferred to the department of public affairs), and market master, and their respective offices or departments, and all employees therein, and all bookkeepers and accountants, are distributed and assigned to the department of accounts and finance and shall be under the supervision and direction of the superintendent thereof.

The superintendent of the department of accounts and finance shall procure from all persons and corporations operating public-service utilities in the city such reports as they are by law or ordinance or otherwise required to make to the city, or any of its officers, and procure copies of such reports as are made to the State or any public office or department, and shall collect or cause to be collected all license fees, franchise taxes, rentals, or other moneys which may be due or become due to the city. He shall report to the city council any failure to make reports or to pay moneys due to the city, with such recommendations in relation thereto as he may deem proper. He shall, whenever the city has authority so to do, cause to be examined the accounts and records of any person or corporation operating a public-service utility in the city, and shall report to the council any refusal to permit such examination, with such recommendations in relation thereto as he may deem proper.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SAFETY.

SEC. 5. The marshal, chief of police and police department, and all policemen, officers, and employees therein, and all police stations and property and apparatus used in said police department; the chief of fire department and the fire department, and all firemen, officers, and employees therein, and all fire stations and property and apparatus used in said fire department; the fire and police alarm system, and all property and apparatus belonging thereto; the city physician, assistant city physician, board of health, health officers, and all officers and employees in their respective offices or in the health department of the city, and the city hospital and employees therein, and all buildings, property and apparatus belonging to or used in said offices and department; the fire marshal, inspector of plumbing, city electrician, electrical inspector, and their offices, and all property and apparatus used therein, are all distributed and assigned to the department of public safety.

The superintendent of the department of public safety shall have charge of and supervision and direction over all officers and employees assigned to said department and over all said buildings, property, and apparatus. He shall have charge of all purchases of horses, apparatus, and supplies for said department or the offices and departments assigned thereto. He shall have charge of and supervision over the removal and disposal of garbage. He shall have supervision over the construction and repair of all buildings assigned to said department and may, on application, receive assistance therein from other officers and departments of the city.

DEPARTMENT OF STREETS AND PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

SEC. 6. The superintendent of the department of streets and public improvements shall superintend and take charge of all public work, the cleaning of streets and public places, the entire erection, making, and reconstruction of all street improvements, sidewalks, sewers, bridges, viaducts, and public buildings, and other improvements, and of the repair thereof where not otherwise assigned. He shall approve the estimates of the city engineer, which may be made from time to time, of the cost of such work as the same progresses, and accept any building erected, work done, or improvement made when completed according to contract, and perform such other duties as may be provided or required by ordinance or resolution. He shall have control, management, and direction of the lighting of streets and alleys, of public grounds and buildings not otherwise assigned, and of all lamps, lights, lighting materials, and persons charged with the care thereof. He shall have charge of enforcing the provisions of law or ordinances relating to billboards. He shall have control and supervision over all public dumping grounds and dumps. He shall have supervision over all public-service utilities and all persons or corporations rendering service in the city under any franchise, contract, or grant made or granted by the city or State, and shall report to the council or other proper officer any failure of said person or corporation to render service or to observe the requirements or conditions of the franchise, contract, or grant under which such public-service utility is operated.

The civil engineer and engineer's department, and employees therein, street commissioner, inspectors, and all other officers and employees employed in connection with the work of said department are distributed and assigned to the department of streets and public improvements, and shall be under the supervision and direction of the superintendent thereof.

DEPARTMENT OF PARKS AND PUBLIC PROPERTY.

SEC. 7. The superintendent of parks and public property shall have charge of and supervision over Greenwood Park, Waveland Park, Grand View Park, Union Park and Birdland, South Park, Good Park, city bath house and park, Bates Park, Hoyt Sherman Place, Nash Park, the library grounds, River Front Park, and park at Raccoon Forks; of so much of Des Moines and Raccoon Rivers and their banks as belong to the city or are under its control, and of all other public parks and pleasure grounds in the city, and of all officers and employees, including park policemen, employed in or about said parks and pleasure grounds, and of all property belonging to said parks and pleasure grounds, or kept or used in connection therewith. He shall have charge of and supervision over the city hall and janitors thereof, and the park or grounds adjoining said city hall. He shall have charge of and supervision over Woodland Cemetery, Glendale Cemetery, Laurel Hill Cemetery, and all other public cemeteries in the city, and of the sextons and other employees in the cemeteries, and of all property belonging to or used or kept in connection with the public cemeteries. He shall have charge of and supervision over Tracy Home property, the abandoned fire station at Seventeenth and Crocker Streets, and all other property owned or controlled by the city and not assigned to some other department. He shall have charge of and supervision over all boulevard and street parkings and park ways. He shall have charge of and supervision over the improvements, maintenance, lighting, and care of all said parks, pleasure grounds, and cemeteries, and of the buildings therein or thereon. He shall have charge of enforcing the provisions of law and ordinances relating to the improvement and care of street parkings and the planting of trees therein. He shall have such assistance from the civil engineer and engineering department as may be necessary in surveying, laying out improvements, and otherwise improving the parks, and may, on application, receive assistance from other officers and departments of the city.

OF APPOINTMENTS OF ASSISTANTS AND EMPLOYEES.

SEC. 8. Except as otherwise provided by law or ordinance, the superintendent of each department shall appoint or employ such assistants and employees as may be authorized by the council and necessary to the efficient conduct of the service in said department.

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

SEC. 9. That the superintendent of each department shall make and enforce such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law or the ordinances or rules and regulations adopted by the city council, as may be necessary to secure efficient conduct of the service of his department or the business in charge thereof.

SEC. 10. This ordinance is declared to be urgent and necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety, and shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and publication as provided by law.

EXHIBIT D.

[Pages 169 to 181, inclusive, from "The Dethronement of the City Boss" (Funk & Wagnalls), by John J. Hamilton.]

RESULTS OF THE NEW SYSTEM IN FIVE TYPICAL CITIES.[1]

1. IN GALVESTON, TEX.

A board of three eminent engineers was employed and paid to devise plans for the reconstruction of the city after the flood.

The emergency following the great storm was dealt with efficiently by the city acting independently and also jointly with the county and State.

The grade of the entire city was raised by the city with the assistance of the State; a great sea wall was constructed by the county; these improvements aggregating in cost $4,000,000.

Annual budgets exceeding the city's revenue by an average of about $100,000 gave way to budgets kept strictly within the municipal revenues.

A floating debt of $204,974.54 was paid off out of current revenues; bonds to the amount of $462,000 were retired; new bond issues were restricted to permanent improvements; an agreement was reached with holders of city bonds whereby the interest was reduced from 5 to 2½ per cent for a period of five years.

The city hall and the waterworks pumping station wrecked by the flood were rebuilt.

The water system was extended and provision made for a duplicate main across the bay.

Three engine houses were built and others damaged by the storm were repaired.

The entire business section was repaved at a cost of $183,027.07.

Rock and shell roads, costing $181,064.04, were constructed.

The drainage system was extended at a cost of $245,664.47.

Old judgments to the amount of $18,026.65, inherited from former administrations, were paid off.

City employees were paid in cash instead of in scrip subject to heavy discounts.

City bonds quoted as low as 60 in the flood year were speedily brought to a premium.

A modern system of bookkeeping was introduced.

Interest was collected on city balances in depositories.

A plan of preparing the annual budget and strictly adhering to it was adopted.

The sanitation of the city was greatly improved.

The streets were kept cleaner and cleared of fruit stands and other obstructions.

Police regulations were more strictly enforced.

Saloons were excluded from the residence districts.

The policy evil and public gambling were abolished.

The city hall was transformed from a resort for loafers into a business office.

[1] A majority of the cities operating under the new plan have adopted it within the year 1909, and many of these have not yet held their first elections under it.

Political influence was eliminated in selecting heads of departments and employees; the merit system was established.
The city water service was metered.
Favoritism was done away with in all public services.
The services of men of the highest character and ability were secured for the municipality.
Public confidence in the city government was fully restored.
The city was emancipated from the long reign of strife, dissension, and jealousy; harmony and general prosperity were reestablished.
Notwithstanding the enormous extension of municipal activities and the increase of efficiency a tax rate of $1.60 for city purposes, the lowest of any large city in Texas, was not increased.

2. IN HOUSTON, TEX.

City indebtedness to the amount of $400,000 was retired.
The practice of issuing bonds to cover annual deficits was discontinued; expenditures were kept rigidly within the city's income.
Current obligations were promptly met; warrants, previously quoted at 75 to 80, became worth par.
The city credit was completely restored, following a period when bondholders had been threatening to sue on account of defaults.
Waterworks were purchased for $901,000 with popular approval, showing confidence in the new government. The purchase was approved in 1906 by a vote of three to one, whereas it had been rejected in 1903.
The water service and fire protection were greatly improved.
The street railways were required to bear their share of public burdens and improve the service.
Three schoolhouses were built, at a cost of $106,000.
A 15-acre park was purchased for $55,000 cash.
Dangerous old bridges across the bayou, in the heart of the city, which the old government had refused to replace, except by bond issues, were replaced with new bridges, paid for out of current revenues.
Twelve other bridges were put in repair.
The city plumbing work and supplies were obtained at 15 to 25 per cent less cost by the adoption of business methods.
Good vitrified brick paving was substituted for inferior work.
A shipload of brick was imported from New York, and the brick combination was broken.
The cost of electric lights was reduced from $80 to $70 per arc per year.
The tax rate was reduced from $2 to $1.80.
Graft, sinecurism, favoritism, and incompetency, which permeated every department of the old government, were done away with.
Police and sanitary regulations were strictly enforced; the fostering of vice was discontinued.
Quarreling and dissensions disappeared; harmony was restored both in the city government and among citizens.
Business methods were adopted in all departments. Council sessions became short, businesslike, and devoid of speech making.
The confidence of citizens in the integrity of the city government was completely restored.
Growth and prosperity of the city were stimulated by improved civic conditions.
These good results were obtained simply from change of the system, members of the commission having been connected with the former government.

3. IN LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Strict enforcement of law was substituted for the city's traditional policy of defiance of State prohibitory laws.
Bankruptcy and financial helplessness were succeeded by a thoroughly satisfactory condition of the city's finances.
Citizens of the highest standing were induced to accept office under the new régime, the politicians being driven from power by large majorities.
A period of decreasing population and stagnation in business and building was followed by one of rapid growth in all of these respects.
In 25 years under the old form of government the city paved 12 miles of streets. In the first 21 months under the new system 5½ miles were paved.
City bonds to the amount of $20,200 were paid off in two years.
The county indebtedness for which the city was responsible was paid off by the latter to the net amount of $119,750 within two years.
Only $27,000 of the new bonds were issued against these reductions; a net reduction of the bonded indebtedness of $112,950 took place, while the new issues represented permanent improvements.
A new set of books was operated, and the city's business handled like that of "an up-to-date mercantile establishment."
All bills due from the city were paid before the 10th of each month.
Appointments were made on account of fitness, regardless of party affiliations.
Property values largely increased, and the volume of real estate transfers showed unprecedented growth of the city.
New factories were built, which give employment to 300 men.
All of these improved conditions were brought about without increased taxation, despite a loss of $80,000 a year from illegal saloon licenses.

4. IN DES MOINES, IOWA.

The city's net loss in the last year of the old government was $134,510.62; the net gain in the first year under the new charter was $48,439.10, a total relative saving of $182,949.65.
The tax levy for city purposes in the last year of the old charter was 38.7 mills (on the 25 per cent valuation established by law); the first year under the new charter it was 36.4 mills.
Public improvements to the value of $357,755.50 were made during the first year under the new system.
Contractors were held strictly to the specifications, and claims for extras, which had grown into a crying abuse, were firmly rejected; the quality of all public work visibly improved.
Several carloads of inferior creosote paving blocks were rejected.
A modern bookkeeping system was installed.
Municipal expenditures were held strictly within the city's revenues, ending the practice of piling up yearly deficits, to which almost the entire city bonded debt was due.
Numerous leaks were stopped; all the licenses collected were turned into the treasury.
Street lights, formerly costing $75 to $95, were reduced to a uniform rate of $65 per arc per year, and the moonlight schedule abolished, insuring better service.
Incandescent lights were reduced from $24 to $17 in some cases and the all-night schedule was substituted for a moonlight schedule in others, at the same price, $17.
All public work was promptly done; complaints were given immediate attention.
The streets were kept noticeably cleaner; the alleys in business sections, never before cleaned at all, were now thoroughly cleaned.
Street signs were put up throughout the city, years of clamor for it having failed to induce the old government to make this improvement.
The wages of men with teams were increased from $3.50 to $4.50; those of day laborers from $2 to $2.25; much better service was required.
The quality of public service in all departments was noticeably bettered.
The cost of cleaning catch basins was reduced from $1.40 to $1.12.
Uniform cement walks were laid throughout the business section.
Bridge paving under the old system cost $4.74 per yard by contract; under the new system it was done by day labor for $4.09.
Culverts costing $17.61 per cubic yard under the old plan were built for $12.63 under the new.
Mowing in the parks was done at 75 per cent of the old cost.
Work done by contract was let to the lowest bidders, without manipulation.
The "red-light" district, operated under the corrupt and unlawful monthly fining system, was entirely abolished.
Bond sharks, who owned the segregated "red-light" district and oppressed the inmates of disorderly houses, were driven from business.
Public gambling houses, previously operated under police protection, were closed.
Petty gambling devices, such as slot machines, formerly protected, were effectually prohibited.
Ordinances regulating saloons were strictly and uniformly enforced.
Friendly, but mutually self-respecting, relations between the city government and public-service corporations were established.
City politics were entirely divorced from State and national politics.
Private enterprise and public spirit were remarkably stimulated. Over $400,000 was raised for public purposes by citizens in two years. A great coliseum, new Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. buildings were provided, etc.
The city, formerly notorious for "divisive strife," became notably harmonious.
The confidence of citizens in the representative character of the city government was fully reestablished.
Following is a comparative statement of working funds in Des Moines in 1907 and 1908:

Cash on hand Apr. 1, 1907	$70,396.63
Claims outstanding	55,085.83
Excess cash over claims		$15,310.80
Cash on hand Apr. 1, 1908	$72,790.11

Excess cash over claims		104,855.28
Gain, 1908 (first year under new charter)			48,439.03
Gain, 1908 over 1907			182,949.65

5. IN CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA.

Bonds were retired and interest paid thereon amounting to a total of $61,980.
Extensive park improvements were made.
Additional park property was acquired.
A new fire station was erected. All city buildings were put in good repair.
The island in Cedar River, formerly a dumping ground, was purchased by the city and turned into a beautiful civic center.
The services of Charles Mulford Robinson, the civic improvement expert, were secured, and, following his advice, streets were extended, street signs were erected, waste paper receptacles provided, etc.
Public works of all kinds were done on a large scale, and well done.
The receipts from the police court increased from $75 to $700 per month without an increase of arrests.
License taxes were impartially collected.
Milk and meat inspection laws were enforced.
Five patrolmen were added to the city police force.
Gamblers were driven from the city.
The social evil was segregated and put under severe restrictions.
Defective paving was rejected; contractors were held to the specifications.
Cash discount was taken on all city bills.
Interest was collected on city balances in banks.
The city's credit was established at the highest standard.
Business methods were introduced in all departments of the city government.
Complaints from citizens were given immediate attention. Civic pride was awakened.
The growth of the city was largely accelerated.

EXHIBIT F.

[From the Dallas News, May 28, 1911.]

TEXAS RECALL IS UPHELD BY HIGHER COURT—BONNER AND LEFEVRE CASES FROM THIS CITY ARE AFFIRMED—JUDGE FOREE SUSTAINED—PROVISION IN DALLAS CITY CHARTER HELD TO BE VALID—TEXT OF THE OPINION.

In an opinion rendered by Justice Bookhout in the court of civil appeals yesterday the judgment of the lower court in the case of Shearon Bonner v. E. A. Belsterling et al., composing the Dallas Board of Education, is affirmed and the recall provision of the Dallas city charter is held to be valid. A similar opinion was rendered in the case of Arthur Lefevre v. The Dallas Board of Education, in which the same questions were presented to the court.

The suit was instituted by Shearon Bonner against members of the Dallas Board of Education elected at a recall election held in Dallas on April 4. The plaintiff alleged that the election, which was held under the recall provision of the Dallas city charter, was not a valid election, and sought an injunction restraining the newly elected board from discharging the duties of the board, and also from interfering with the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties as a legally elected member of the board.

In the fourteenth district court, before Judge Kenneth Foree, a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition was sustained and the injunction denied. From the ruling of the lower court the plaintiff appealed. Following the action of the court yesterday, E. G. Senter, of Meador, Davis & Senter, who represented Mr. Bonner, stated that the case will be taken to the supreme court.

The decision rendered yesterday is in conflict with an opinion rendered by the court of criminal appeals of this State in the case of ex parte Farnsworth. In discussing the opinion of the Farnsworth case, the court said: "While we have great regard for the opinion of the court of criminal appeals, we are not favorably impressed with the reasoning in those cases. It is in conflict with the principles announced by the supreme court.

TEXT OF THE OPINION.

The opinion follows:

No. 6512. Appeal from Dallas County. Shearon Bonner, appellant, v. E. A. Belsterling et al., appellees.

This was a suit by appellant, Shearon Bonner, against E. A. Belsterling, J. D. Carter, J. B. McCraw, M. A. Turner, W. A. Goode, and Frank Gilbert, citizens of Dallas; the petition alleging in substance that on the 5th day of April, 1910, an election was held in the city of Dallas for members of the board of education, and that C. C. Lane, as president, H. D. Ardrey, Robert N. Watkin, John W. George, L. K. Wright, and John C. Mann, and petitioner were elected and duly qualified as members of said board; that on the 11th day of August, 1910, another election was held and John W. George and J. C. Mann were removed from said board and that J. D. Carter and J. B. McCraw were elected and qualified as their successors. That thereafter on the 4th day of April, 1911, another recall election was held under the provisions of article 9 of the city charter of the city of Dallas, and in compliance with the provisions thereof, and in said election E. A. Belsterling, as president, and J. D. Carter, John B. McCraw, M. A. Turner, W. A. Goode, and Frank Gilbert were chosen as members of said board of education to succeed C. C. Lane, as president, H. D. Ardrey, L. K. Wright, J. D. Carter, John B. McCraw, and this plaintiff, Shearon Bonner, provided said article is valid and enforceable. That in said last election John W. George and J. C. Mann were not candidates. That the right and title of E. A. Belsterling, as president, and M. A. Turner, W. A. Goode, and Frank Gilbert as members of the board of education depends entirely upon the recall election held upon the 4th day of April, 1911, and upon the validity of the said recall provisions of the said city charter of the city of Dallas.

PLAINTIFF'S ALLEGATIONS.

Plaintiff charges that the said defendants, Belsterling, Carter, Gilbert, Goode, McCraw, and Turner, are utterly without right or authority to exercise the functions of the board of education of the city of Dallas, unless said recall provisions of the city charter of the city of Dallas are valid, and unless said election held thereunder is a lawful election and unless the lawful members of said board of education, namely, those elected at the election held on the first Tuesday of April in the year 1910, could be removed from their offices prior to the expiration of the term of two years to which they were elected by means of the exercise of the said recall provision of the city charter of the city of Dallas. He alleges that, having been lawfully elected as a member of the board of education of said city of Dallas for the term of two years, he is now entitled to hold his position as a member of said board of education and to exercise all the functions and privileges as a member of said board, but that he is unlawfully and wrongfully deprived of his office and the same is wrongfully withheld from him by the defendants herein, and that defendants wrongfully refuse to permit this plaintiff to exercise the right appertaining to his office.

The prayer is that plaintiff be restored to the possession of his office and that a writ of mandatory injunction be issued, directed to each of the defendants, commanding and requiring them and each of them to desist from further acting and from pretending to act as a board of education of the city of Dallas and as members thereof, and from depriving this plaintiff of his privilege of so acting and from exercising and pretending to exercise control over the public schools of the city and from interfering with, or molesting in any way, the plaintiff in his exercise of his rightful authority as a member of said board of education, and to desist from receiving and disbursing the funds belonging to the public schools of said city, and from discharging or attempting and pretending to discharge any of the teachers or other employees of said public schools and from exercising or attempting to exercise any right, privilege, authority, or power in any way appertaining to the office of said board of education or a member thereof, and that upon final hearing said injunction shall be made perpetual.

The defendants demurred generally to the petition, which demurrer was sustained and the injunction prayed for refused. To this action the plaintiff excepted and perfected an appeal.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

If, as alleged, the appellant was elected a member of the board of education of Dallas at an election held in April, 1910, for the term of two years, and he afterwards qualified as such member and entered upon the duties of the office, his term not having expired, he was entitled to a writ of injunction preventing defendants from ousting him from office, unless the election held in August, 1910, removing him from office and electing his successor, was a valid election and held under a valid law. It is conceded the election was held under the recall provisions of the charter and in compliance with their requirements, but it is asserted in the petition and here contended that these provisions of the charter are invalid. This appeal brings before us the validity of the recall provisions of the charter. The question is: Did the legislature have the power by special charter to authorize the people of Dallas to remove a member of the board of education from office at a special election, called upon a petition, as provided for in article 9 of the charter? In other words, is the recall feature of the charter constitutional? Article 9 of the special charter of the city of Dallas, providing for the recall of elective officers, contains the following provision: "A petition signed by the qualified voters of said city, equal in number to at least 35 per cent of the entire votes cast for the office of mayor on the final ballot at the last preceding general municipal election, demanding the election of a successor of the person sought to be removed, shall be filed with the city secretary; provided, that the petition sent to the board of commissioners shall contain a general statement of the grounds upon which removal is sought. The signatures to the petition need not be all appended to one paper, but each signer shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the street and number. One of the signers of each such paper shall make oath before a notary competent to administer oaths that the statements made herein are true and that each signature to the paper appended is the genuine signature of the person whose name purports to be thereunto subscribed."

ARGUMENT NOT SOUND.

It is insisted by appellant in argument that the signing and presentation of a petition as required by this article of the statute operated as a removal of the officer named in the petition. This argument is not sound. After the presentation of the petition the charter requires the board of commissioners to determine whether the petition is sufficient, and if sufficient, to fix a date for the holding of the election and cause publication and arrangements to be made for its holding not less than 30 nor more than 40 days from the time the petition is found to be sufficient. The election is to be conducted and the result declared in all respects as other city elections, and a majority of all the votes is made necessary to elect. In the event no candidate shall receive a majority at the first election a second election shall be held. The successor of any officer so removed is to hold office during the unexpired term of his predecessor. Any person sought to be removed may be a candidate to succeed himself, and unless he requests otherwise in writing the city secretary shall place his name on the official ballot without nomination. In any such removal election the candidate receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected. At such election if some other person than the incumbent receives the highest number of votes the incumbent shall thereupon be deemed removed from the office upon the qualification of his successor. A compliance with all these prerequisites is necessary to operate as a recall and removal of an incumbent from office.

CONTENTION NOT TENABLE.

It is contended by appellant that this article of the charter operates to deprive a citizen of property and privileges without due process and in a manner other than by due course of the law of the land. In other words, that a public office is "property" within the meaning of the Federal and State Constitutions, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." This contention is not tenable. The office of member of the board of education of the city of Dallas is not "property" within the meaning of that word as used in the State and Federal Constitutions. Offices are created for the public good, at the will of the legislative power, with such privileges and emoluments attached as are believed to be necessary to make them accomplish the purposes designed. Except as restrained by the constitution the legislature may reduce the compensation of an office, and, except as to incumbents of a constitutional office, it may remove officers not only by abolishing the office, but by an act declaring it vacant. Whoever accepts a public office must accept it with this principle in view. (Atty. Gen. v. Jochim, 99 Mich., 358; 58 N. W., 611; 23 L. R. A., 699; Graham v. Roberts (Mass.), 85 N. E., 1009.)

The office of member of the board of education of Dallas is property only in the sense that the incumbent is entitled to receive the emoluments of the office so long as he holds the same and until he has ceased to legally occupy the office. But it is not property within the meaning of that word as used in the State and Federal Constitutions. (Atty. Gen. v. Jochim, supra; in re Carter, Sup. Ct. Cal., 74 Pac., 997; Butler v. Pennsylvania, 10 How., 402; Augusta v. Sweeney, 44 Ga., 463; Throop on Officers, secs. 345, 346, 17–19; Connor v. Mayor, 5 N. Y., 296; Nichols v. McLean, 101 N. Y., 533; 5 N. E., 347; Hoboken v. Gear, 27 N. J. Law, 273; Kenny v. Hudspeth, 59 N. J. Law, 322; 36 Atl., 662; State v. Council, 53 Minn., 242, 55 N. W., 118.)

DOES NOT IMPAIR OBLIGATION.

It is contended that the recall provision of the charter seeks to substitute within the municipality a socialistic and communistic system of government in lieu of a republican form of government, and that it operates to impair the obligation of contract. We do not concur in this contention. The charter does not impair the obligation of contract. The appellant held his office by election and not by contract. It is neither socialistic, communistic, or obnoxious to a republican form of government to require an elective officer of a municipal government to submit to the voters of the city the issue for their determination whether he shall longer continue in office. (Kadderly v. City of Portland, Sup. Ct. Oregon, 74 Pac., 710; in re Pfahler, Sup. Ct. Cal., 88 Pac., 271; Erickson v. City of Des Moines, Sup. Ct. Iowa, 115 N. W., 177.) In the case last cited it was held, and we think correctly, that a republican form of government within the meaning of Article IV, section 4, of the Federal Constitution guaranteeing to the States a republican form of government was a guaranty to the State at large and not to the system of local government provided by the States for the regulation of their municipalities. At the time of granting the charter the legislature that passed it was composed of good men from every calling and from every part of the State, among the number many lawyers. It is common knowledge that charters are formulated by the people of the towns, presented by their representatives to the legislature, and in case of opposition committees attend upon the legislature to secure the wish of the majority. The city of Dallas had three representatives in the house and one in the senate that enacted this law. The members of the legislature did not regard the law as socialistic or communistic or as obnoxious to a republican form of government. Under the law a court has no power to review the action of the legislative department of the government, but when called upon to administer a law enacted by it must, in the discharge of its duty, determine whether the law is in conflict with the constitution, which is superior to any enactment that the legislature may make; but in the examination of such a question it must be borne in mind that except in the particulars wherein it is restrained by the Constitution of the United States the legislative department may exercise all legislative power which is not forbidden expressly or by implication by the provisions of the constitution of Texas. If there is any doubt as to the validity of the law, it is due to the coordinate branch of the government that its action should be upheld and its decision accepted by the judicial department. (Brown v. City of Galveston, 97 Tex., p. 9.)

It is insisted that article 9 of the city charter of Dallas is invalid because it would operate to remove an officer for causes other than those prescribed by law, without the finding of the truth of the same by a jury, and through a mode contrary to the procedure required by the constitution. Appellant cites article 5, section 24, of the constitution in support of this contention. This article reads: "County judges, county attorneys, clerks of the district and county courts, justices of the peace, constables, and other county officers may be removed by the judges of the district courts for incompetency, official misconduct, habitual drunkenness, or other causes defined by law, upon the cause therefor being set forth in writing and the finding of its truth by a jury." The office of member of the board of education of Dallas is not one of the offices named in this section of the constitution, and unless such officer comes within the meaning of "other county officers" mentioned in the above clause, he is not a county officer. Appellant argues that a school trustee, such as a member of the board of education of the city of Dallas, is a county officer and comes within the class "other county officers" referred to in the constitution. In support of this argument appellant cites the cases of Hendricks v. State (49 S. W., 705) and Kimbrough v. Barnett (93 Tex., 301). In the Hendricks case the question before the court was whether a school trustee in a school district which is a subdivision of the county, as are commissioners and justice precincts, is a county officer. It was held that such a trustee is an officer in and for the precinct of the county of which his precinct is a part, and therefore of the county itself. In that case it was said that "in the case of the trustees appointed by the county judge for school communities, they may be removed by that officer upon the written application of a majority of the patrons of the school." (Rev. Stats., 1895, art. 3955.)

This decision, in effect, holds that a trustee of a school district in a subdivision of the county such as a justice's precinct is a county officer, and that such a trustee can be removed by the officer who appointed him. In the case of Kimbrough v. Barnett it was held that the trustee of an independent school district is a county officer within the meaning of section 30, article 16 of the constitution, stipulating that the "duration of all officers not fixed by the constitution shall never exceed two years." But it does not hold that such a trustee is a county officer within the meaning of section 24, article 5 of the constitution, specifying the causes for which county judges, county clerks, and other county officers may be removed from office in a suit at law. The removal sought was not of the character provided for in this section of the constitution.

INTENT OF CITY.

The city of Dallas, in procuring the charter, intended that the elective officers of the city should be subject to both the existing and changing public sentiment on all local measures, and that if the official conduct of any elective officer failed at any time to so respond he was subject to recall, if the majority of the voters of the city so determined. The appellant accepted the trust subject to this power in his constituency, and the duration of his term of office is dependent upon the will of the majority as expressed at the polls. Whether the interests of the city will be better subserved by a ready obedience to public sentiment than by the adherence to the individual opinion of the officer on questions of public concern is a political and not a legal question. (Hilzinger v. Gillman, Sup. Ct. Wash., 105 Pac., 472.)

The office of member of the board of education of the city of Dallas is an office created by the charter of said city, and such member is a municipal and not a county officer within the meaning of section 24, article 5, of the constitution of Texas. The office is created by the charter, which also contains the recall provision, and it was under this charter that the appellant was elected a member of the board. Appellant having been elected under a charter containing the recall provision, his right to the office, as was said in Griner v. Thomas, 105 S. W., 1060, "is qualified by all preceding valid laws which provide for its suspension or termination." His term of office, as stated in the charter, was two years, but this was subject to the condition subsequent that 35 per cent of the entire votes for candidates for mayor at the last preceding election could by petition express their disapproval of his official action and demand that he be sustained by a vote of confidence. Such procedure is not in conflict with the constitution. The constitution recognizes that large, growing cities should be permitted to determine for themselves and in their own way the many important questions of local policy as they arise.

LEGISLATURE HAD AUTHORITY.

Article 11, section 5, of the constitution provides that "cities having more than 10,000 inhabitants may have their charters granted or amended by special act of the legislature." Under this clause the legislature had authority to grant the special charter to Dallas, and to include therein the recall provision. But appellant contends that the recall provision violates article 16, section 43, of the constitution. This section provides that "No man or set of men shall be exempted, relieved, or discharged from the performance of any public duty or service imposed by general law by any special law. Exemption from the performance of such public duty or service shall only be made by general law." The legislature having been authorized to grant or amend a charter to a city with the population of Dallas by special law and the charter granted having placed the public schools of the city under the management and control of a board of education composed of a president and members and provided for their election, it follows that the office of president and members of the school board being created by special law and not general law that article 16, section 43, of the constitution does not apply.

Appellant cites sections 13 and 15, article 1, and section 25, article 4, of the constitution as inhibiting the recall provision of the charter. We have carefully considered these provisions of the constitution, and it is clear that they do not expressly restrain the enactment complained of, nor do they, by fair implication, have that effect. It follows, therefore, that this provision of the charter not being prohibited by either the State or Federal Constitutions, must be held valid. (Hilzinger v. Gillman (Sup. Ct., Wash.), 105 Pac., 472; In re Pfahler, supra; Good v. Common Council (Cal.), 90 Pac., 45; Kadderly v. Portland, supra; Pacific States Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. State (Sup. Ct., Oreg.), 99 Pac., 427; Erickson v. City of Des Moines, supra; City of St. Louis v. Western Tel. Co., 149 U. S., 467–470; Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S., 511; Graham v. Roberts, supra.) This court in a case in which the regular judges were disqualified and the court was composed of special judges, after mature consideration, held that the "initiative" provision of the Dallas charter was constitutional. (Telegraph Co. v. City of Dallas, 131 S. W., 80.) A writ of error was granted by the supreme court and the case was reversed, because the method pointed out in the initiative clause of the charter had not been followed in the passage of the ordinance. (Telegraph & Tel. Co. v. City of Dallas, 134 S. W., 321.) In that case, in the opinion of the supreme court, it was said: "There is nothing in our constitution which forbids the legislature to submit proper subjects to the voters of the city by referendum. The authority of the legislature in creating municipal corporations is ample for that purpose." This is a holding that the initiative and referendum features of the charter are not prohibited by the constitution.

The cause has been briefed on both sides by able lawyers, and the briefs show exhaustive research. The only cases cited by appellant's counsel sustaining their contentions are the two cases styled Ex parte Farnsworth (135 S. W., pp. 535 and 538), by the honorable court of criminal appeals of this State. While we have great regard for the opinions of that court, we are not favorably impressed with the reasoning in those cases. It is in conflict with the principles announced by the supreme court in Brown v. City of Galveston and is contrary to its holding in Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. Dallas.

It follows from the above remarks the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BOOKHOUT, Associate Justice.

Delivered May 27, 1911.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senate ought to vote on these amendments to-night. I doubt very much whether we can get a quorum, and I intend to suggest at this time an adjournment until Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a moment while I make a suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold it for a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is well known, I think, that there is no Senator who desires to speak to-morrow; that is, if it be not well known generally, I think it would be well known if some investigation were made. If we meet to-morrow and there be no debate, necessarily the amendments that are the pending question must be voted upon. To-morrow is a day that is to be devoted to pleasure by some of the most prominent and most influential Senators of the body. I would be very sorry to interrupt the cruise that is proposed, in order to enable them to enjoy the breezes of the ocean instead of the sultry atmosphere of this Chamber; but I do not want the amendments voted upon in the absence of those Senators and many other Senators who feel that the heat has been so great and the depression so extreme that they must find some recuperation in a week-end visit elsewhere. We will make no progress by being compelled to come here to-morrow and then adjourning. I hope that the Senator from Utah will see the propriety at this time of adjourning until Monday. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] makes a very pertinent suggestion, that even the department clerks have Saturday afternoon as a vacation.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not on the Mayflower.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are not on the Mayflower, of course; they are not on reciprocity either; but, nevertheless, the parallel is close. Now, does not the Senator from Utah think that we shall make just as much progress by adjourning until Monday as by adjourning until to-morrow and then having an hour or two of useless and profitless bickering here, followed by an adjournment, without accomplishing anything?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I thought that would be all that would be accomplished, I certainly would not insist upon meeting to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator what he expects to accomplish to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. I do feel that there is a majority of Senators in the city who will be here to-morrow, and I see no good reason why we should not go right on with the business before the Senate. I do not see that the mere fact that seven or eight Senators are leaving the city cuts any figure at all with the business of the Senate so long as we have a quorum.

Mr. CUMMINS. Those are the very Senators that I want here to vote upon this question. They have not been heard in debate, and they ought at least to have a chance to vote.

Mr. SMOOT. But I suppose——

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not be here to-morrow. I have proposed most important amendments to the bill which he has reported, and I am certainly entitled to his presence—his possible presence—when a vote is taken. Now, I ask the Senator from Utah, in all fairness, does he expect to vote upon these amendments to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there may be a number of Senators who desire to speak; if not, the proper business to be brought before the Senate would be a vote upon the amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah will remember that when I asked a week ago that a day should be fixed for voting upon these amendments opposition to my request came, among others, from the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and his objection was that he desired to speak upon either these amendments or amendments of his own of a somewhat similar character. The Senator from North Carolina has given notice that he will address the Senate on Monday morning, and I think it would be very discourteous to him to attempt to vote on these amendments to-morrow, before he shall have addressed the Senate, as he proposes to do.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will be prepared now to agree to a day in the near future upon which a vote may be taken on the pending bill and amendments?

Mr. CUMMINS. In response to the Senator from Missouri, I will say that, so far as I am concerned, I am entirely willing to fix a day, by unanimous consent, for voting upon the amendments I have presented. I endeavored to secure that consent, as the Senator knows, last week.

Mr. STONE. Upon all amendments and upon the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not upon the bill. So far as I am concerned, there will be no time fixed for voting upon the bill until the amendments that it is well known will be proposed to the bill shall have been reasonably debated. Whenever that time elapses I shall not interpose any objection to fixing a time for voting upon the bill.

Mr. STONE. With a view to ascertaining the judgment and view of the Senator from Iowa, I ask if he will be willing to fix some day, about, say the 25th of July, for voting upon the bill and all amendments?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, speaking for myself, I shall not agree to fixing a date for voting upon the bill and all the amendments until the amendments have been fairly and reasonably presented in debate. I have learned through some experience and more observation that it is very unwise to fix a time for voting upon an important measure until the debate upon the measure has been practically concluded. I shall, however, be glad to fix a day for voting upon the amendments that have been debated up to this time.

Mr. STONE. What amendments has the Senator in mind?

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendments I have proposed and which constitute the pending question.

Mr. STONE. What day would the Senator suggest as agreeable to him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest next Tuesday. I do that because I want to give the Senator from North Carolina an opportunity to address the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Would it be agreeable to the Senator to vote on his amendments immediately after the Senator from North Carolina has concluded his speech on Monday next?

Mr. CUMMINS. As the Senator from Missouri can well see, I might desire to make some further explanation on my own part if anything should develop in the course of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina that would seem to require a reply; but I am sure that I can do that so that we can vote upon the amendments on Tuesday. That need not delay the debate generally.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] yesterday gave notice that "on Monday, July 10, 1911, following the routine morning business, he would address the Senate on H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, and especially upon the amendments offered by himself to the bill."

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand the character of the notice the Senator from North Carolina has given; but the Senator from Utah will remember, I am sure, that when I asked that Friday, the 7th of July, be fixed as the date for voting upon these amendments the Senator from North Carolina objected because he wanted to address the Senate upon his own amendments, which bore close relation to the amendments I have proposed; and I think the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] made the same objection.

Mr. SMOOT. As I remember, the Senator from North Carolina did say that he wanted to speak upon certain amendments, and he mentioned the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa. I do not remember, however, that the senior Senator from Indiana stated that there was objection on his part on account of his desire to speak to those amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me long enough, I will ask unanimous consent that on the legislative day of Tuesday next the pending question shall be disposed of before adjournment, with the right upon the part of any Senator to ask for such a division of the pending question as parliamentary law or the rules of the Senate may warrant.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I hope very much that the Senator from Iowa will agree to have the vote on his amendments taken on Monday instead of on Tuesday. It seems that there is no Senator ready to occupy the floor to-morrow, and a suggestion is made that the entire day on Saturday shall be practically lost. So far as we have been advised, the Senator from North Carolina is the only Senator who has indicated a desire to speak on Monday. By meeting at 11 o'clock and sitting until 5 or 6 o'clock, which we can afford to do in order to facilitate the consideration of these measures, surely there will be abundant time for additional debate on the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa; and, so far as I am concerned, I would be much better satisfied to have the agreement provide for a vote on Monday before adjournment on the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa. I am a little afraid I do not exactly understand what might be embraced by the words "the pending question."

Mr. CUMMINS. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, and will change my request to Monday and substitute the words "amendments offered by myself" in lieu of "the pending question"——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa are the pending question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Understanding, however, that there are to be such separate votes upon the amendments as the rules of the Senate and parliamentary law will permit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be granted without being put in the request, as a matter of course. If a division were demanded, a division would be given under the rules, of course, whether or not such a stipulation were in the request.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest that there will be a good many divisions; that is to say, there will be several votes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can see by reading the amendment that there might be 50 separate propositions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like the unanimous-consent agreement to include one other thing, namely, that the votes be taken by the yeas and nays, so that we will not be under the necessity of calling for the yeas and nays when every vote is had.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that we will understand the proposition, I should like to ask the Senator if this is his request, that immediately after the close of the speech to be delivered by the Senator from North Carolina we shall begin to vote upon the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that on the legislative day of Monday the Senate conclude voting upon the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa, divided as perhaps they may be by the rules of the Senate, without fixing the time when the Senate shall begin to vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before adjournment upon that legislative day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before adjournment on that legislative day.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Iowa consent to fix an hour when the voting shall begin?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President, I do not know but that some one will desire to say a few words with regard to the amendments. I would not want to make the agreement other than I have stated it, which is the usual form of agreements for that purpose.

Mr. STONE. It is not at all unusual to fix an hour when we shall begin to vote, I think.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, the other form is much more usual and, I think, much more satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see what the Senator from Iowa will gain by his request if granted. After the Senator from North Carolina finishes speaking the question before the Senate will be on the amendments of the Senator from Iowa, and we will commence to vote upon those amendments. If we do not get through on the legislative day of Monday, let us take an adjournment until Tuesday and then vote again on Tuesday. According to the request of the Senator from Iowa, the legislative day may go over until Tuesday and over Wednesday and over Thursday, and we could gain nothing at all; but if the Senator will say that we will vote upon that calendar day before adjournment, then we would know when the matter would be closed.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Iowa is not attempting to gain anything by the request. He is simply attempting to make it reasonably convenient to Members of the Senate by furnishing them some reasonable information as to the time when the votes will be taken upon these amendments. Of course it is within the power of the Senator from Utah to object.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to interfere with the vote on the amendments or the vote upon the pending bill. While I am opposed to the bill, I know that the business interests of the country almost demand that the question here be settled one way or the other. I would be perfectly willing to vote to-morrow upon the bill or fix any date to vote upon the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. What business is particularly disturbed by the free admission of agricultural products? I do not know of any great trust or great business that is particularly concerned in the admission of agricultural products. I do not believe that the statement of the Senator from Utah is borne out by the facts.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, all I want to say is this: The reciprocity bill is not the only bill before the Senate. There is the wool bill——

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, well——

Mr. SMOOT (continuing). The farmers' free-list bill, and there may be other bills; more than likely they will be discussed before adjournment comes, and the quicker they are disposed of the better it will be for the welfare of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then why not take up the bills in which the country is really interested, and which paralyze business, and dispose of them before we dispose of the bill that does not affect business at all?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I hardly think we will reach any agreement by entering upon a debate of that kind. Let us see if we can reach an agreement. The Senator from Iowa is frank——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Nobody yet has objected to the request of the Senator from Iowa, because the Chair has not yet put it to the Senate. Possibly, if the Chair put it to the Senate, it might be agreed to, and that might end the whole matter.

Mr. STONE. Yes; it might and it might not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It might not. That is true.

Mr. STONE. If the Chair will be patient and indulge me a little bit——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Most certainly. It is a pleasure to be patient with the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. We may save some confusion. The Senator from Iowa is a frank man and any statement he makes will be accepted by all of his colleagues.

Now, I ask him, inasmuch as these amendments we are discussing, about which we are trying to reach a date for voting upon, are his amendments, will he tell the Senate about how many yea-and-nay votes he thinks are likely to be asked for?

Mr. CUMMINS. Answering the Senator from Missouri in perfect candor, it would seem to me that there ought to be 10 or 12 roll calls. I think, so far as I am concerned, that the divisions I will ask for would be about 10 or 12.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator, then, tell me the ground upon which he predicates his objection to fixing, say, 5 o'clock Monday to begin voting; not later than 5 o'clock?

Mr. CUMMINS. My objection is, it is utterly impossible to foretell the conditions which will then exist. I have asked for this unanimous-consent agreement only to avoid what I believe to be an unfairness that might otherwise be inflicted upon me and upon those who favor these amendments in voting to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. No Senator, of course, wishes to be unfair to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think myself that whenever the debate finishes upon these amendments we ought to take a vote upon them, but when we do take a vote upon them, we ought to take it at such a time as that all or nearly all Senators could be here if they desire to be here.

To-morrow will be the close of a very oppressive week. Many of the Senators desire to leave the city for perfectly legitimate reasons.

Now, does not the Senator from Missouri think it would be unfair to insist upon a vote upon these amendments to-morrow?

Mr. STONE. Oh, that is an entirely different question—voting to-morrow. I have not said anything about that.

Moreover, there may be force in one reason suggested why that should not be done, namely, that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] desires to speak on Monday on some amendments of his and upon all of the amendments pending. Still if the Senator from North Carolina should not care to discuss the amendments of the Senator from Iowa at all, then we might, with his consent, unless there are urged very good reasons to the contrary, vote to-morrow if there is a quorum and more of the Senate present.

Now, the Senator from Iowa said that the chairman of the Finance Committee was absent and that seven or eight other Senators were going away on pleasure excursions along the bay. It could not benefit the Senator, I imagine, to have the chairman of the Finance Committee here. For what reason has the Senator anxiety to have him here if he is absent of his own motion?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would add dignity to the occasion.

Mr. STONE. Oh, that was the reason.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I at least would be in the presence of my own leader.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Will not Senators permit the Chair to state this proposition so that we can ascertain whether there is any objection or not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary has placed it in this form:

> It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on the legislative day of Monday, July 10, 1911, and before adjournment on that day, the Senate will dispose of the pending amendment to the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, the right of division reserved, and that the vote or votes taken shall be by yeas and nays.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose the words "pending amendment" are intended to refer to the amendments offered by me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There can be but one amendment pending at a time. Later, of course, it can be divided by——

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Chair in that particular.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to address an inquiry: Has the Senator from Iowa observed Rule XVIII, which says that a motion to strike out and insert is not within the rule of a divisible question? I have just sent for a copy of the amendment, and I find it comes under that rule, and it is not divisible, and I think the Senator would be confronted with that rule, and probably it should be taken notice of now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, however, as I understand that rule it means this: The motion to strike out a particular thing and insert a particular thing instead is not divisible.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought it as the Senator has expressed it, but being in some uncertainty of mind I have sent for the amendment, and I find it is in the express terms that bring it within the scope of this rule.

It would not be fair to the Senator from Iowa if we should proceed to-day upon the assumption that the question might be divided, when he might discover on Monday, or whenever it came to a vote, that this amendment must be treated as a whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me see if I understand the senior Senator from Idaho. I have moved, for instance, that meat be stricken from the reciprocal dutiable list and be inserted in the United States free list.

Now, I agree that in so far there could be no division of that question, but I have also moved that finished lumber be stricken from the reciprocal dutiable list and put upon the free list. Does the Senator from Idaho think that that rule would preclude the division of the question as between meat and lumber?

Mr. HEYBURN. A reading of the rule would seem to bear out that conclusion. It reads:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided.

I read that part of the rule. In the title of the amendment, as it is printed here, it proposes to strike out and insert.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. While the amendment printed as a whole proposes to strike out different paragraphs of the bill and insert others in place of them, I think each particular item in the bill, like meat or wheat or anything of that kind, should be treated as a separate proposition. If there is any doubt about that, it ought to be included in this unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; that is the reason why I called attention to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is perfectly clear that the amendment is susceptible of innumerable divisions.

Mr. NELSON. It strikes me so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Anything can be separated which can be acted upon separately as a distinct proposition without affecting the rest. This can be done, in this instance, so it seems to the Chair, world without end almost.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Chair is right, and I am anxious to be clear on the subject because I have some amendments of the same kind. While I have grouped them all on one printed sheet, they relate to different paragraphs.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true in some cases. If I may be permitted, I will take a specific case. On page 19 it is proposed to strike out lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and insert lines 20, 21, 22, and 23, covering the items; that is, strike out the words—

> Timber, hewn, sided or squared otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars or in building wharves.
> Sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber not further manufactured than sawed—

And insert—

> Logs; timber, however sided or squared; round timber, for whatever use; sawed boards; planks; deals and other lumber, planed or unplaned, finished or unfinished; laths and shingles.

There is a clear case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a distinctly separate proposition to strike out and insert, each provision being susceptible of amendment prior to voting upon the proposition to strike out and insert.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a question of interpreting those words. They are an exception to the general rule in regard to the division of a question, and the exception is rather meagerly stated, but very succinctly stated. Then I understand from the Chair's suggestion that as to those items they could not be separated? You could not take a vote, for instance, on hewn timber, omitting the other items substituting logs, et cetera, however sided?

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Chair looks at it again, he is not sure about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me suggest the meaning of the rule. It seems to me perfectly clear that you can not separate the motion to strike out from the motion to insert; that is, the motion to strike out and insert is inseparable. But if the motion to strike out and insert comprises many subjects, then there can be the same division of those subjects as there could be in any other amendment. That is the way I have construed the rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. My only object in calling attention to it was that some one might be taken by surprise because this is a very long amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very.

Mr. HEYBURN. And it contains many subjects, and I thought it no more than fair that if one might hereafter care to raise the question it be suggested at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad the Senator from Idaho raised it, because if the Chair is in any doubt with regard to it, I must take some other means of accomplishing the end I have in view.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair might make a suggestion, the Chair thinks that when the question arises there will be no difficulty whatever, unless it be on the question of the proposition of ordering the yeas and nays. The Chair has a notion that many of these divisions might be such that a yea-and-nay vote would not be called for. For instance, on page 18, line 5, "corn meal." That is a proposition by itself. The next line, line 6, "barley malt." That is a proposition by itself, and might be voted upon separately.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say, for information, that so far as I am concerned I intend to ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon the manufactured products of the free list—on flour, oats of all kinds, oatmeal, bran, et cetera. I think they all are naturally grouped in one proposition.

I do not say that others may not ask for different divisions——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is my purpose. Then likewise with meats, and likewise with steel and iron, and likewise with woolen, cotton, and silk, and so on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call the Senator's attention directly to some of the proposed amendments that involve a principle rather than an item, and call his attention to pages 23 and 24 and part of 25, which states three different distinct principles running through this legislation, and the proposition is to strike out——

Mr. CUMMINS. Those do not strike out——

Mr. HEYBURN. Those I have referred to are in italics. For instance, on page 23 of the bill you propose to strike out and you propose to substitute. I merely call attention to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have twice made a vain effort to accomplish something, and I now withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 8, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 8, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., as follows:

O Thou who art the God of all comfort, as again the muffled voice of heavenly death is heard in our midst, we bow our heads in submission to Thy holy will. Yet are we not affrighted, seeing that whether living or dying we are Thine. Therefore though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we fear no evil; knowing that if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building from Thee, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. And unto Thee, with whom is the fountain of life, and in whose light we shall see light, be glory on earth and in heaven, now and for evermore. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. No. 135, A) memorializing Congress to initiate or participate in a general world-wide movement through The Hague Tribunal or otherwise for international peace and general disarmament and the international policing of the high seas.

Whereas during the last two-year period, in a time of profound peace, our Federal Government expended for military and naval purposes over $555,000,000.

Wisconsin's share of this enormous expenditure, on the basis of population, exceeds $14,000,000, and by reason of the high economic, industrial, and social development of this State its contribution undoubtedly far exceeds the above amount.

The total amount of taxes levied directly by this State during the two-year period was less than $2,000,000, and the total of income and of disbursements of this State for all general purposes was less than $13,000,000.

The people of Wisconsin, therefore, pay for the military and naval expenditures of the Federal Government more than seven times the amount paid in taxes to the State and a sum far in excess of the receipts or of the disbursements of the State.

This enormous expenditure for war purposes does not include any part of the expenditure during the same period of over $322,000,000 for pensions and over $43,000,000 for interest on indebtedness incurred in time of war.

Whereas the progress of civilization and of science has relegated war, as a settlement of international disputes, to a thing of the past, and the growing control of the Government by the people, who must bear its burdens, has practically rendered future war impossible, and the present military and naval expenditures constitute wholly an economic loss, which expenditure, in view of our scientific progress, is not even justified for war purposes, benefiting only the great trusts and combinations which fatten on contracts for construction and supplies, robbing the great body of the people of the higher economic plane which is justly theirs.

Whereas any movement for peace, to insure success, must be placed upon a broad basis, and recent attempts to place the burden or responsibility of this movement upon the people of any race or language must fail.

Civilization is not confined to English-speaking people, and the population of our country and of our State has come largely from other than English-speaking countries, making signal contribution to the cause of peace.

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to initiate or participate in a general world-wide movement through The Hague Tribunal or otherwise for the establishment of international peace and for a general disarmament by all nations and the international patrolling of the high seas and of territory exposed to or inhabited by savage tribes.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
H. C. MARTIN,
President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lincoln, Nebr., members of the Spanish War Veterans' Association, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the payment of travel pay and allowances to officers and enlisted men of volunteer organizations who served in the Philippine Islands, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. OWEN. I present a list of the boards of trade and chambers of commerce who have recently passed resolutions favoring the establishment of a national department of health. I ask that the list be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

There being no objection the list was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

New Lots Board of Trade, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Charleroi Business Men's Association, Charleroi, Pa.; St. Albans Board of Trade, St. Albans, W. Va.; Chamber of Commerce, Olean, N. Y.; the Citizens' Commercial Club Co., Delphos, Ohio; Covington Commercial Club, Covington, Tenn.; the Pasadena Board of Trade, Pasadena, Cal.; the Worcester Board of Trade, Worcester, Mass.; Merced County Chamber of Commerce, Merced, Cal.; Oakland Chamber of Commerce, Oakland, Cal.; San Jose Chamber of Commerce, San Jose, Cal.; Chamber of Commerce, Allentown, Pa.; Fitchburg Board of Trade and Merchants' Association, Fitchburg, Mass.; Merchants' Association and Chamber of Commerce, Altoona, Pa.; the Indianapolis Board of Trade, Indianapolis, Ind.; Richmond Hill Board of Trade, Richmond Hill, New York City; Reno Commercial Club, Reno, Nev.; the Commercial Club of Minneapolis, Minneapolis, Minn.; Chamber of Commerce, Petaluma, Cal.; the Dubois Business Men's Exchange, Dubois, Pa.; the Parkersburg Board of Commerce, Parkersburg, W. Va.; Board of Trade, Ashland, Mass.; Oklahoma City Chamber of Commerce, Oklahoma City, Okla.; Chamber of Commerce, Quincy, Ill.; Chamber of Commerce, Athens, Ga.; Business Men's Club, Huntsville, Ala.; Lancaster Board of Trade, Lancaster, Pa.; Monte Ne Commercial Club, Monte Ne, Benton County, Ark.; Board of Trade, Long Branch, N. J.

Mr. STONE presented memorials of sundry citizens of El Dorado Springs, St. Louis, and Carthage, in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday-rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

MATTHEW LOGAN.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 270) for the relief of Matthew Logan, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 99) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 2966) granting an increase of pension to Lucy E. Culp; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 2967) for the relief of John Doyle, alias John Geary; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2968) granting a pension to Rose Logan;

A bill (S. 2969) granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Lanam (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 2970) granting an increase of pension to John L. Mellender (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 2971) granting a pension to Mollie E. Strickland (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 2972) granting an increase of pension to Robert Martin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 2973) granting an increase of pension to Reuben F. Brownell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

ASTORIA (OREG.) CENTENNIAL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 31) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Astoria Centennial, to be held at Astoria, Oreg., August 10 to September 9, 1911. It is a very short measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "nineteen hundred and eleven," to strike out "such tents, with necessary poles, ridges, and pins, as may be required at said centennial" and insert "100 wall tents and 100 conical tents, with poles, ridges, and pins for each," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the executive committee of the Astoria Centennial, to be held at Astoria, Oreg., August 10 to September 9, 1911, 100 wall tents and 100 conical tents, with poles, ridges, and pins for each: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property; the same to be delivered to said committee designated at such time prior to the holding of said centennial as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and B. F. Crawshaw, general secretary of said executive committee: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from said B. F. Crawshaw a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not listen to the reading of the joint resolution, and I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if it provides that a bond shall be given, so that in case of the loss of tents the Government will be reimbursed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It provides that a bond shall be given by the centennial committee fully protecting the Government against loss.

Mr. WARREN. And that the Government shall be at no expense.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The bill has been read, and I ask that it be taken up for action on the substitute I have submitted.

Mr. BURTON. I understood that the bill was to come up on Monday. It involves some very important changes in principle, as I understand it, as well as changes in the specific improvement.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It involves no changes in the improvement at all, and the only change——

Mr. BURTON. It involves changes in the size and number of the dams.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is in the original bill, and it is exactly the same in the substitute that I propose. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not object.

Mr. BURTON. I had understood that the bill would come up on Monday, and I had intended to give it somewhat careful examination before that time. Thus far I have been unable to do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Very well; if the Senator desires I will wait until Monday.

Mr. BURTON. I think it ought to go over until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

PLATS AND FIELD NOTES OF PUBLIC-LAND SURVEYS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 32) authorizing chief clerks in offices of surveyors general to approve and sign plats and field notes of public-land surveys. It is an important measure and should be passed speedily.

The Secretary read the joint resolution and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT JUDGES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2653) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OWEN. I should like to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will not object to the consideration of this bill. If he will permit me, I should like to state to him very briefly the purpose of it.

It makes no change whatever in the existing law except to make it clear that the circuit judges in the various circuits of the United States shall constitute the circuit court of appeals. Under the existing law it is thought that that is not made quite clear, and the only change in section 118 of the code which is proposed by the bill is to add to it this provision:

The circuit judges in each circuit shall be judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit, and it shall be the duty of each circuit judge in each circuit to sit as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit from time to time according to law.

It has been thought, as I said, that the existing law did not make it quite clear that the circuit judges shall be the constituent members of the circuit court of appeals, and it is to remove that doubt, and that only, that this bill has been reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. OWEN. I will state that I have no objection to the purpose of the bill, but I wish to move an amendment to it, and I am not quite prepared to do it to-day.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as first in order on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is an amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps, and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have prepared an amendment to the bill providing that the maximum sum to be charged shall be 8 per cent per annum in addition to certain charges connected incidentally with the loan. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], has taken a great deal of interest in this matter, and in his absence it seems to me that perhaps the measure ought not to be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, on objection.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Ohio would offer his amendment so that it might be pending, we could see what it is in the meantime.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be very glad to do so. I will send for it.

Mr. CURTIS. With that understanding, let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment to the bill, after which objection is made to its present consideration, and it goes over.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. POMERENE is as follows:

On page 6, line 7, strike out the words "1½ per cent per month" and in lieu thereof insert the words "8 per cent per annum."

Also, in line 10, after the word "charges," insert the following, "except that a charge not exceeding $1 may be made for services and expenses for each loan, when originally made, but no charge shall be made for any renewal thereof or part thereof, and."

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

REGULATION OF AMUSEMENT PLACES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 2600) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prevent the exhibition of obscene, lewd, indecent, or vulgar pictures in public places of amusement in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1899) to repeal a portion of an act heretofore passed relating to the alienation of the title of the United States to land in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected" was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill has already been passed over.

The bill (S. 2653) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary" was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill has just gone over.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR FOURTH CIRCUIT.

The bill (S. 2604) authorizing the President to appoint an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

VERMONT JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 1650) to amend section 110 of "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 110 of "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, by striking out all of that section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 110. The State of Vermont shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the district of Vermont. Terms of the district court shall be held at Burlington on the fourth Tuesday in February, at Windsor on the third Tuesday in May, at Rutland on the first Tuesday in October, and at Brattleboro on the third Tuesday in December. In each year one of the stated terms of the district court may, when adjourned, be adjourned to meet at Montpelier and one at Newport.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDENING AND EXTENSION OF MINNESOTA AVENUE.

The bill (S. 1069) to authorize the widening and extension of Minnesota Avenue from Pennsylvania Avenue SE. to its present terminus, near Eastern Avenue, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the widening and extension of Minnesota Avenue SE. from its present terminus near Pennsylvania Avenue SE. to the Sheriff Road," be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out the limitation of 90 days from the passage of the act within which condemnation proceedings shall be instituted, and also the provision that said avenue shall be widened and extended according to the permanent system of highway plans adopted in and for the District of Columbia, and adding to the act a new section to be known as section 3, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to prepare a new highway plan for that portion of Minnesota Avenue lying between East Capitol Street and Foote Street so as to provide better alignment for said avenue, and to avoid improvements lying within said avenue, as proposed under the plan for a permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia, and to record said new plan in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia; and said Minnesota Avenue shall be widened and extended within the limits named in said act according to the permanent system of highway plans adopted in and for the District of Columbia as said plans are amended by the new highway plan for a portion of said avenue herein authorized."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend 'An act authorizing the widening and extension of Minnesota Avenue SE. from its present terminus near Pennsylvania Avenue SE. to the Sheriff Road,' approved February 25, 1909."

ANACOSTIA RIVER AND EASTERN BRANCH.

The bill (S. 1898) providing for the protection of the interests of the United States in lands and waters comprising any part of the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, and lands adjacent thereto, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 2768) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "at," to insert "a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, in the State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR COLORADO.

The bill (S. 77) to provide for the appointment of one additional district judge in and for the district of Colorado was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES UNDER THIRTEENTH CENSUS.

The bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

VOLUNTEER FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all male citizens of the United States and all male persons of foreign birth that declare their intention to become citizens of the United States under and in pursuance of the laws thereof, who are of sound body and mind and between the ages of 18 and 45 years, are hereby declared to constitute the national forces, and, with such exceptions and under such conditions as may be prescribed by law, shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the organized and active land forces of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army and of the National Guard while in the service of the United States: Provided, That in time of war, or when war is imminent, the aforesaid land forces may be augmented by such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize.

SEC. 3. That the Regular Army is the permanent military establishment, which is maintained both in peace and war under the provisions of law.

SEC. 4. That the National Guard is the Organized Militia of the several States and Territories and District of Columbia, organized as a land force and subject to be called into the service of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the volunteer forces shall be maintained only during the existence of war or while war is imminent, and shall be raised and organized, as in this act provided, only after Congress has or shall have authorized the President to raise such a force: Provided, That the term of enlistment in the volunteer forces shall be the same as that for the Regular Army, and all officers and enlisted men composing such volunteer forces shall be discharged from the service of the United States as soon as practicable after the President shall have issued a proclamation announcing the conclusion of hostilities or the passing of the emergency.

SEC. 6. That when volunteer forces are to be raised the President shall issue his proclamation, stating the number of men desired for each arm, corps, and department, within such limits as may be fixed by law, and the Secretary of War shall prescribe such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, as may be necessary for the purpose of examining, organizing, and receiving into the service the men called for: Provided, That the power to organize shall include the power to provide the officers and enlisted men of all grades and classes, including trained nurses, male and female, that may be necessary in the various arms, corps, and departments: Provided further, That all enlisted men received into the service in the volunteer forces shall, as far as practicable, be taken from the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, in proportion to their respective populations.

SEC. 7. That the volunteer forces shall be subject to the laws, orders, and regulations governing the Regular Army in so far as such laws, orders, and regulations are applicable to officers or enlisted men whose permanent retention in the military service, either on the active list or on the retired list, is not contemplated by existing law; and no distinction shall be made between the Regular Army and the volunteer forces in respect to the conferring upon officers or enlisted men of brevet rank, medals of honor, certificates of merit, or other rewards for distinguished service, nor in respect to the eligibility of any regular or volunteer officer for service on any court-martial, court of inquiry, or military commission: Provided, That the oganization of all units of the line and of the signal troops of the volunteer forces shall be the same as that prescribed by law and regulations for the corresponding units of the Regular Army: Provided further, That when military conditions so require, the President may organize the land forces of the United States into brigades and divisions and such higher units as he may deem necessary, and the composition of units higher than the regiment shall be as he may prescribe: Provided further, That to each regiment of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and to each battalion of engineers and signal troops organized under this act, there shall be attached the same personnel of the Medical Department as are attached to like organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the organization of the coast defenses, of machine-gun detachments, establishments of the Medical Department, remount depots, military trains, secret-service agencies, military prisons, lines of communication, including their supply depots, and of other adjuncts that may be necessary in the prosecution of war, and the organization of which is not otherwise provided for by law, shall be as the President may from time to time direct.

SEC. 8. That the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all officers required by this act; the number and grade of such officers not to exceed the number and grade of like officers provided for a like force of the Regular Army: Provided, That all appointments below the grade of brigadier general in the line of the volunteer forces shall be by commission in an arm of the service and not by commission in any particular regiment; and officers in each arm of the service shall be assigned to regiments, and transferred from one regiment to another, as the interests of the service may require, by orders from the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no officer above the grade of colonel shall be appointed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That to provide the staff officers that will be necessary in the various staff corps and departments in time of war or while war is imminent, and that are not otherwise provided for in this act, the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, such number of volunteer staff officers of the proper grades for such corps and departments as he may find necessary: Provided, That the total number of such officers so appointed, including all such officers of the National Guard called into the service of the United States, shall not exceed the ratio of 1 officer to 200 enlisted men for all National Guard and volunteer forces called into the service of the United States: Provided further, That the President may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, volunteer chaplains at the rate of 1 for each regiment of volunteer infantry, cavalry, and field artillery, and 1 for every 12 companies of volunteer coast artillery raised.

SEC. 10. That in appointing the volunteer officers authorized by this act the President may select them from the Regular Army, from the National Guard of the District of Columbia, and, upon the recommendation of the various governors, from the National Guard of the several States and Territories in proportion, as far as practicable, to their respective populations, and as near as may be from the localities from which the troops were recruited, and from the country at large: Provided, That in appointments from the country at large preference shall be given those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or the volunteer forces, or who have been graduated from educational institutions in which military instruction is compulsory, and to those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act approved January 21, 1903: Provided further, That at the same time, not to exceed one Regular Army officer shall hold a volunteer commission in any one battalion of volunteer engineers or signal troops, or in any one battalion of volunteer field artillery; and not to exceed four Regular Army officers shall hold commissions in any one regiment of volunteer cavalry, field artillery, or infantry, or in any 12 companies of coast artillery, including their field and staff, at the same time: And provided further, That Regular Army officers appointed as officers of Volunteers under this act shall not thereby vacate their Regular Army commissions or be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing therein.

SEC. 11. That the vacancies created in any grade not above that of colonel among the commissioned personnel of any arm, staff corps, or department of the Regular Army, through appointments of officers thereof to higher volunteer rank, shall be filled, as far as possible, by temporary promotions according to seniority in rank from the next lower grade; and vacancies that remain thereafter in the lower grades in said arm, corps, or department and that can not be filled by temporary promotions, as prescribed by this section, may be filled by the temporary appointment of officers of such number and grade or grades as shall maintain said arm, corps, or department at the full commissioned strength authorized by law: Provided, That officers temporarily promoted or appointed under the terms of this section shall be so promoted or appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms that shall not extend beyond the cessation of existing hostilities or the passing of the existing emergency as defined by the President's proclamation, whereupon the said officers shall be discharged from the positions held by them under their temporary promotions or appointments: Provided further, That officers temporarily promoted under the provisions of this section shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their lineal or relative standing in the Regular Army.

SEC. 12. That all returns and muster rolls of organizations of the volunteer forces shall be rendered to The Adjutant General of the Army, and upon the muster out of such organizations the records pertaining to them shall be transferred to and filed in The Adjutant General's Office. And regimental and all other medical officers serving with volunteer troops in the field or elsewhere shall keep a daily record of all soldiers reported sick or wounded, as shown by the morning calls or reports, and shall deposit such reports, with other reports provided for in this section, in The Adjutant General's Office, as provided for herein for other reports, returns, and muster rolls.

SEC. 13. That in time of war all organizations of the land forces shall be recruited and maintained as near their prescribed strength as practicable. For this purpose the necessary rendezvous and depots shall be established by the Secretary of War for the enlistment and training of all recruits, and in order that officers may be available for recruiting duty the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint officers of Volunteers of the proper arm of the service, additional to those elsewhere herein authorized, in numbers not to exceed at the rate of 1 major, 4 captains, 5 first lieutenants, and 5 second lieutenants for each organized regiment of cavalry, field artillery, or infantry, each 3 battalions of engineers, or each 12 companies of coast artillery; that for purposes of instruction and discipline the troops at recruit depots herein authorized may be organized into companies and battalions, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, with noncommissioned officers and privates of such grades and numbers as may be prescribed by the President. The recruit rendezvous and recruit depots herein prescribed shall be under the direct control of the Secretary of War, and shall render their reports and returns to The Adjutant General of the Army: Provided, That to maintain the National Guard organizations in the service of the United States at their maximum strength the recruiting rendezvous and depots in any State or Territory may, at the request of the governor thereof, enlist and train recruits for the National Guard organizations in the service of the United States from that State.

SEC. 14. That, in the organization of the recruiting system, the President is authorized to employ retired officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or, in the case of enlisted men, with increased noncommissioned rank; or he may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint and employ retired officers below the grade of colonel, with increased volunteer commissioned rank not to exceed one grade above that held by them upon the retired list: Provided, That retired officers and enlisted men while thus employed shall not be eligible for transfer to the field units, but shall receive the full pay and allowances of the respective grades in which they are serving, whether volunteer or regular, in lieu of their retired pay and allowances: Provided further, That upon the termination of the duty or, in case of those given volunteer rank, upon muster out as volunteers, the officers and men shall revert to their retired status.

SEC. 15. That, except as otherwise specifically prescribed by law, all officers provided for in this act are subject to such assignments of duty and such transfers as the President may direct: Provided, That medical officers of Volunteers when detailed as consulting surgeons shall not exercise command over the hospitals to which they may be assigned for duty, except that by virtue of their commissions they may command all enlisted men: Provided further, That medical inspectors shall be detailed for duty with each army, field army, and division, and for the base and lines of communications, and that no officer shall be detailed for duty as a medical inspector except he be experienced in military sanitation.

SEC. 16. That all officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army: Provided, That enlisted men in the Quartermaster's Department and Subsistence Department of the volunteer forces shall receive the same pay and allowances as enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Engineer Corps.

SEC. 17. That the commander of a division or higher military unit is authorized to appoint, from time to time, military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the volunteer forces to examine into the capacity, qualifications, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer of said forces within his command: Provided, That each member of the board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into: Provided further, That if the report of such board is adverse to the continuance of any officer, and if the report be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from service in the volunteer forces, at the discretion of the President, with one month's pay and allowances.

SEC. 18. That the act approved April 22, 1898, entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," is hereby repealed, and all other laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are, to the extent of such inconsistency only, hereby repealed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of that bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is a general volunteer army bill. It is a bill that has had very careful attention at the hands of the subcommittee and the full Committee on Military Affairs, and numerous hearings have been had on it. In lieu of the various acts that have been made applicable to the military establishment in connection with Regular Army, the National Guard, United States Volunteers, and so forth, this bill lays out a general plan. Of course it costs nothing in times of peace, and the forces provided for would be used only upon order of the President and action of Congress authorizing their use, but if, after exhausting the Regular Army and the militia of the States, other troops should be necessary at any time in case of an emergency the bill provides for United States volunteer forces, their formation, and so forth. As I have already stated, the bill has had very careful attention, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask, does this bill involve any additional appropriation except in case of actual hostilities?

Mr. WARREN. Not a penny; and in case we should have war very much less expense would be involved than under the present system, and the bill would provide a force better officered and better organized than under existing laws, which are inadequate to supply an effective fighting force at a time when the stress of war is present or imminent.

Mr. BURTON. Is this the same bill as the one reported at a prior session or is it a new bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is better than the bill referred to by the Senator, but it pertains to the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming, the former chairman of the committee, one question. In section 4 it is provided "that the National Guard is the organized militia of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, organized as a land force, and subject to be called into the service of the United States."

I take it for granted that it is not intended by this bill to change or disturb the present relations——

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. That is merely——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. The present relations between the Federal Government and the National Guard. Would it not be well to add to that section "as provided by law"? Otherwise it might be——

Mr. WARREN. Add what words, please?

Mr. CUMMINS. Immediately after the words "United States," in section 4——

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; I see no objection to that addition.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is not, of course, an unlimited right of calling the National Guard into service. There are some conditions which must be observed.

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill repeals those conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it wise to use these general phrases, but, on the other hand, we often refer to the law as it is now, which does prescribe the conditions under which the National Guard shall be called into service.

Mr. WARREN. I see no objection to the amendment offered. This is merely intended to be a recital——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure of that. I do not believe it is intended to change at all the relations between the Federal Government and the States.

Mr. WARREN. There is no objection at all to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa offer an amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; to add to section 4 the words "as provided by law."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 7, after the words "United States," insert the words "as provided by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, if we adopt section 18, there will be no law making any provision——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that this is intended to repeal the law which organizes the National Guard and which prescribes its duties and responsibilities and the relation of the Government to it. The Senator from Wyoming has assured the Senate that it is not so intended.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. Perhaps the Senator from Idaho did not hear me say in the commencement that this provides—that is, in order to get the matter in one's mind—that the Army in time of war is to be made up of three forces: First, the Regular Army, with its regular officers, who are in for life, and enlisted men who are in for a regular term; second, the militia forces that are duly organized under the laws by the States, with officers appointed by the governors. They go in in command by companies or battalions or regiments, and the laws regarding the militia are apart and separate and are not touched in any way by this enactment. Third, if a further army is needed or further forces are needed, this provides the machinery for enlisting a United States volunteer force that can be called out only in time of war or in emergencies, and under which all enlistments shall expire upon the proclamation of the President that the emergency has passed, et cetera, and all the officers that have been taken from the Regular Army and placed in positions perhaps of higher rank go back to their former positions and rank.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I think I understand that; but, in my mind, it is a question of whether or not the act of April 22, 1898, which in effect attached the volunteer forces to the Regular Army under certain conditions, would not be included in this repealing clause. That is the only thing. I have not had time to examine it.

Mr. WARREN. Even if it should, that has no reference to the militia.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a question. Our present militia law attaches under certain circumstances to what we call the State militia—that is, makes them a part of the Army of the United States. This is the act which does it. Now, if you repeal the entire act—I have not had time to examine it in detail—but my recollection——

Mr. WARREN. I had no intention to take the Senator by surprise through an early passage of the bill. But the Senator will find, I think upon examination, that what I have stated is true, that there has been care in every word, line, and letter of the bill to preserve all of our late legislation which now governs the militia.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would ask the Senator what other law is there now which incorporates the militia of the various States into the Army of the United States than the act of 1898? What other law is there?

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator refer to the——

Mr. HEYBURN. The act of 1898.

Mr. WARREN. That is not the Dick law, so called, is it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I have not it before me at this moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is the language which attracted my attention:

That the act approved April 22, 1898, entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," is hereby repealed.

My impression is if you repeal that entire act then the reference suggested by the Senator from Iowa would be of no force because there can be no law to refer to.

Mr. WARREN. That law—1898—is not the militia law now in force.

Mr. HEYBURN. That law was intended to do just what this was in a practical manner. This law supplements that.

Mr. WARREN. Very true. This law supplements that and leaves the militia perfect.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely suggest it because you will find if you repeal the law which you are relying upon by reference to give vitality to this law, it will need further reference.

Mr. WARREN. The reference herein contained does not repeal the present militia law.

Mr. HEYBURN. The trouble is, it is general. There is no distinction.

Mr. NELSON. My recollection is that during the Spanish War we established for the first time what we called a volunteer force of the United States, and the President appointed the officers. We had, in addition to the regular troops, volunteer troops from the several States known as State regiments, the officers appointed and commissioned by the governors of the States. Then we had a small volunteer army, created for the first time, where the officers were appointed by the President of the United States. I think this law is the one referred to in this bill—the law of 1898.

This follows in one respect the principle of that law, and that is that these are organizations organized as volunteers of the United States as distinguished from the Regular Army and as distinguished from some troops organized under State governments.

Mr. WARREN. That is exactly so.

Mr. NELSON. And in the cases of these troops the officers are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate instead of by the governors of the respective States as in the case of State militia.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I say, as I remember it, the law which creates the present relation between the General Government and the National Guard—that is, which brought the National Guard into service as an organization—was passed, I think, in 1904 or 1905, and is known throughout the country as the Dick bill.

Mr. WARREN. That is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. And it is that law to which I referred when I suggested that there be added here "as provided by law," for that is the act of Congress which gives the President the power to call the National Guard into the Federal service as an organization under certain circumstances.

Mr. HEYBURN. He has had that power under previous acts.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. I do not believe——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Iowa is, I think, correct. The Dick law was intended to cover the entire ground of the relations of the State militia to, and the form of its utilization by, the United States Government, and to repeal all of the preceding legislation that was obnoxious to the new law just as this proposes to take up the matter of the United States volunteer forces, so well described by the Senator from Minnesota, and it only intends to change and repeal that which would be obnoxious to this proposed law and refers only to the United States volunteers and not to the State militia.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma has been waiting some time. I yield to him.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming one question regarding this bill. The measure, as I understand it, undertakes to institute and organize the volunteer forces of the United States. Now, as I understand section 1—I wish to know whether I understand it correctly or not—every able-bodied citizen of the United States between the ages of 18 and 45 is expressly declared to be a member of the volunteer forces whether he volunteers or not. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator probably knows that at present every male citizen of the United States within a certain age——

Mr. OWEN. The Senators on this side of the Chamber can not hear the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. As every Senator doubtless knows, every male citizen of the United States within a certain age is liable to military duty in case of great necessity by way of draft, and of course this provides for volunteers only, and states the kind of men that can be accepted as volunteers.

Mr. GORE. It was my understanding that every able-bodied citizen—of course, in certain exigencies—was liable to military service; and if section 1 had provided that these citizens were liable to military service in certain contingencies, or were eligible as members of the volunteer service, it would be one thing, but to make men volunteers who do not volunteer strikes me as being a little singular.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, that is exactly the language that has been on the statute book for years and years. I have before me—it has just been handed to me—the act of 1903, and it commences:

> That the militia shall consist of every able-bodied male citizens of the respective States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and every able-bodied male of foreign birth who has declared his intention to become a citizen, who is more than 18 and less than 45 years of age, and shall be divided into two classes, etc.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has not noticed the difference between the words as they are used in this bill "national forces" and "volunteer forces." Section 1 does not provide that every able-bodied citizen between 18 and 45 shall constitute the volunteer forces.

Mr. GORE. That is the point I was inquiring about. As I heard the reading I understood it to be volunteer forces.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it says that all able-bodied citizens, or all citizens who are of sound body and mind and between the ages of 18 and 45 years are hereby declared to constitute the national forces.

Mr. GORE. I misunderstood it in the reading of the bill. I understood it said "volunteer forces." That was the point I desired to inquire about.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course those would include the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the volunteer forces as well.

Mr. WARREN. I may say that the law upon which our present militia is based is that approved January 21, 1903, known as the Dick law, as amended by the act of May 27, 1908, and subsequent acts.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I had not been out of the Senate for a moment when this bill was called up I would have objected to its consideration this morning. I think now that the bill ought to be laid over for a day or two, in order that it may be examined. It is manifest here already that the bill has not been given a thorough investigation by the Members, and without desiring in the least to impede the passage of the bill, I myself should like to have a chance to look at it. It is a very important measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, any Senator can interpose an objection at any period during the proceeding. It is not too late to interpose an objection.

Mr. REED. I thought we had passed that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, the bill came up in regular course on the calendar. It was my desire to have it read and printed in the RECORD, and, of course, if any Senator wishes to have it lie over, I shall make no objection, even if I were permitted to do so, but I could not effectually object.

Mr. REED. I thought we had passed that point.

Mr. WARREN. But it is a matter, I will say to the Senator, that has had very long and very earnest attention by the old Committee on Military Affairs and by a new subcommittee, and considerable attention by the new general Committee on Military Affairs. I feel so confident that the bill is the best one we have ever presented that I want to invite attention to it, and I would insist, if I could, upon every Senator giving it his especial attention.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Missouri for just a moment, he will notice that while the bill is general in its terms nothing can be done under it except by an act of Congress. That is a condition precedent to the reorganization of the volunteer force under the very terms of the bill. Section 5 provides—

> That the volunteer forces shall be maintained only during the existence of war or while war is imminent, and shall be raised and organized, as in this act provided, only after Congress has or shall have authorized the President to raise such a force.

In other words, before the President or the General Staff could do anything under the terms of the bill some action of Congress would be necessary. So, in the last analysis, Congress is the final arbiter, and Congress determines whether anything shall be done under it at all.

Mr. REED. I wish to say that I have not the slightest doubt but that the committee has given the bill the very best thought. This may be a very wise measure. I hope it is, and I think we will probably find that it is. But it is a very important measure, notwithstanding the clause just referred to by the Senator from Oregon. If it were not important, its enactment would not be pressed at this time. I think if we let it go over for a day or two, so as to give us all a little chance to look into it, it will be the better course to follow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over under the objection of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask permission to say just a word to the Senate and the Senator from Missouri. The Senator will find upon an investigation, which I hope he will make, that it is the same way, or nearly the same way, of raising troops as already provided for, but the existing legislation is, some of it, antiquated and some of it crude, having been hurriedly enacted. This is in one sense new legislation, but in another it is simply a better grouping of the present legislation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before the matter is laid aside I desire, in justice to the remarks which I made, to state that as I understood it, and I verified the fact, this is to take the place of the act of Congress which was passed a few days before the breaking out of the Spanish War, or rather before the declaration of war. Three days before the declaration of war Congress enacted a law for which this is intended to be a substitute. That law has stood as the law of the land since that time, and the war was fought under it. The volunteer forces were provided and called into action by virtue of the act that is to be repealed. I was only solicitous to see that no valuable provision in that law should be dropped out of this measure.

The State militia are not organized under an act of Congress. Congress recognizes the State organizations and has enacted legislation by which they may cooperate, but that is not a part of the armed forces of the Nation except when actually engaged in the service. The act of Congress under which the Spanish War was fought and troops organized and brought into service is a very important piece of legislation. It served the purpose very well during that time. While there were some amendments to it, still the amendments were not very material.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that this will repeal only such portion as may be inconsistent.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was that language which attracted my attention. I was raising the inquiry as to whether or not that language is exactly as it should be, "That the act approved April 22, 1898, entitled," and so forth, "is hereby repealed, and all other laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are, to the extent of such inconsistency only, hereby repealed."

That would apply to the act of Congress that was passed the day after Congress declared war. Congress declared war on one day and on the next day enacted a provision that governed during the entire war in regard to the organization of the forces. From the way this language is punctuated and the way it is stated here it is a question as to whether or not that statement "to the extent of such inconsistency only"——

Mr. WARREN. It repeals that act, and then repeals——

Mr. HEYBURN. The inconsistent provisions.

Mr. WARREN. In any other act.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it does not deal with the inconsistent provisions of the first act. That is general, but it is of course——

Mr. WARREN. It repeals that.

Mr. HEYBURN. It repeals it absolutely. The reservation applies only to the act that was passed the day after the declaration of war.

Mr. WARREN. There were several acts.

Mr. HEYBURN. Those were the important acts. One was the organization of the Army and the other was the organization of officers.

Mr. WARREN. This skims out and preserves everything that is adaptable in that law and all the others.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, it is a most important piece of legislation, and it ought not to be hastily considered or acted on. As the Senator from Wyoming has suggested, it is not his intention to press it unduly, because we are reorganizing the whole system of war, you might say the reserve forces of the Government in time of war.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to be allowed to say just a word further. Not many years ago the War College was established; also a General Staff. Their work—a certain portion of it—was intended to be confidential. We have had bitter experience of the tremendous cost of war without proper preparation. Under this law and with the work of the General Staff and with the War College plans will be worked out and information can be given and received as quickly as, for instance, we could ask where a certain city lot is located. The party in charge who is asked to put his finger on the map can state where it is situated almost instantly. It is expected that the War College and General Staff will, under the terms of this bill, always have in readiness prepared papers showing where rendezvous and recruiting stations may be placed, showing what transportation is available at every point, how long it would take to move troops and supplies from any given point to any one of the danger points, what the cost would be, and so forth; in fact, a complete general plan for the moving of troops, the Volunteers as well as the Regular Army, upon a few hours' notice from any one point to another.

The bill is important, and we want to have a thorough understanding and knowledge of it, and therefore a thorough explanation of its provisions. Many changes in war-equipment matters have of late occurred. The fighting units and formations of our forces have changed since some of the standing laws were passed. For instance, a regiment of infantry to-day has a platoon of machine guns, which is a new factor. A law of this kind is the framework or warp into which we may weave the filling. Under it we make first our plans, our maps, and thus have our working tools ready to proceed in any manner or direction, if called upon, along the lines of war.

As I have stated, there need be no immediate hurry about it. I hope that every Senator will take up the matter, and if any criticism seems necessary make it known here on the floor, because we want a law that we believe to be right and we want everyone, as near as may be, to be satisfied with it. Those who have looked into it most believe that in case we have another war like the last one the expenditure of nearly half the money that was then expended might be avoided if we could proceed properly under regular plans of legislation.

Mr. REED. I wanted to ask the Senator before he took his seat, just for my own information, if this bill originated or was recommended by the military authorities—that is, if the plan emanated from that source?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that we have received annually, I think ever since the Spanish War, the opinions of the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War or both along the lines of reforming our volunteer legislation, and this is the result of all those suggestions and the result of long-continued consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs and those Members of the Senate who are especially interested in military affairs, some of whom have served in the Army themselves. A number of the members of the Military Committee have so served. As the bill will show, it has been amended throughout so much since it came from the military authorities that it is in the nature of a substitute. We have followed the lines advocated by those in military authority as far as we could from a legislative standpoint. I believe we have legislation now proposed in this bill which ought to be satisfactory to Congress, and fairly so to the military establishment.

Mr. REED. To what extent does the bill impinge upon or impair the militia arm as heretofore existing?

Mr. WARREN. It has not a thing to do with it. There are three possible arms for service under the bill. First, the Regular Army; second, the States' militia, which, under the law, may go into the service of the United States; the law governs that; and then this proposed United States volunteer force, which comes in as a third force—a United States force, a photograph, if you please, of the Regular Army, only that enlistments are during emergency for enlisted men, and the commissions of officers are also during emergency only.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that we have had before us on several occasions the volunteer officers of the State militia.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. They have appeared in regard to this bill and made many valuable suggestions; and the bill has been modified on the suggestions made by them.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is very satisfactory to all or at least a majority of the officers and men composing the militia.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is an overlap which I presume at some stage of the consideration of the bill might be improved. The language in regard to both the State militia and the language in this measure provides that the men without any exception, within certain ages and under certain conditions, may be called. Of course a man has a right to enlist in the State militia and to go into the Government's service through that avenue, and he would not be subject to impressment under this law.

Mr. WARREN. This law would not impress anybody.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just been reading that language. It is unusual; it does not sound very warlike.

Mr. WARREN. There can be no impressment in the bill; they are volunteers.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is not very warlike language. It is not the usual language used in dealing with such matters:

> That when volunteer forces are to be raised the President shall issue his proclamation, stating the number of men desired, etc.

In war the word "desired" does not issue from a commanding officer; it is that they come. In other words, a proclamation heretofore for the raising of troops has been that they shall come, not that their presence is desired on a certain occasion at 8.30 or anything of that kind.

Mr. WARREN. Evidently the Senator has forgotten since the war time with which he was well acquainted that in times of draft there is a proportion demanded from each State.

Now, as to the provision that if any State is unwilling to furnish volunteers they come from another, it is an army at large. While the provisions of the act suggest that they shall be as near as may be proportioned among the States, at the same time the force could all be raised if necessary, if refused in other States, from any one State or from several States, and there is no impressment, of course. No one can go in under this act unless he goes in as a volunteer of his own free will.

Mr. HEYBURN. I used the word "impressment" in the American sense and not in the sense used in foreign countries. I do not like a provision which leaves it optional with a State to furnish its quota of soldiers in time of war. I do not like that kind of a provision. A State should be compelled to furnish its quota, and if it did not furnish them as volunteers it should be done by draft, as it was on former occasions. I remember the enrollment for draft very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill makes no provision for any draft, or anything of that sort. The language "desired" is very proper to be used in connection with volunteers. He is invited to volunteer and not commanded to do so. This is solely a volunteer force.

Mr. WARREN. I realize that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Later on, after you get into war, you may leave the volunteer feature and go into the impressment and draft business. When you do, you cease to invite, you command; but as long as the man is called a volunteer he is invited, not commanded.

Mr. HEYBURN. During stages in the Revolutionary War, after the Colonies became States, the quota that each State should furnish was specifically stated. They were not requested to furnish them, but they were directed to furnish them. I think that there should be a little more of the military spirit in the bill. It is rather too mild for military legislation. I think we should have a standing and general law that would authorize the Government to compel the States to furnish their quota of soldiers, and I believe there is enough of military spirit in the American people to justify that kind of legislation. I think it should be in this bill. It is all right to invite them. I have no objection to inviting them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The more military spirit there is among the people the less necessity will there be for the sort of language the Senator desires. If the military spirit was not among the people, then very probably they would have to be commanded. I have never known the time, except during the Civil War, when more people did not volunteer than were needed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The spirit may be among the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In this connection, if the Senator will excuse me a moment longer, I think the fact that one State should happen to fall somewhat below another in the number of soldiers furnished as volunteers cuts no figure at all. The man who is most anxious to fight is generally the best soldier. Take a State like Tennessee, for example, which has always prided herself on furnishing more volunteers than any other State, and I suppose probably will continue to do so. The volunteers the first few days are apt to be the boys who are going to bear the brunt of the fight, and it seems to me it is always well not to use any language except the mildest and the most accurate, especially when you consider that these men are coming as volunteers and not under command. They are coming under invitation. If a State had such a population of a warlike aspiration as that, it naturally would transcend its quota, and another one had a population of such a character as that it would not, all the better will this provision be for the Army.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is much in that, but the Senator will bear in mind that you have already made two previous drafts upon the people in which you will have obtained most of the patriotism. Then, there is a provision here that would be somewhat of a deterrent. The patriotism, while it would never be exhausted, still would have been largely drawn upon, first, by the formation of the Regular Army, and, second, by the State organizations which comes before this proposed organization.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator think that the real patriotism comes when there is fighting, when there is war, rather than through enlistments in time of peace in the Regular Army? The country gets at least as good a quality, perhaps better, of patriotism when the man who enlists believes he is going to do some act to show his valor and love of country.

Mr. HEYBURN. That principle is very well stated, but you must bear in mind, however, that the Regular Army is only a skeleton for the force that exists as soon as occasion for its service arises. We have, for instance, only half the prescribed number in a company or regiment. Now, those who go in there go in because of the patriotism of the hour that impels them to do so.

Next to that men will enlist not in the army proposed by this bill, but they will enlist in their State militia, which upon proffer will be accepted as volunteers by the Government, as always has been the case. That will be probably the flower of the Army—and I say nothing in derogation of the Regular Army, because I have the very highest regard for its character and efficiency. Then comes this third army which is invited courteously to come forward and supplement the two Armies that have already been formed. Here is a provision that will probably meet with some objection:

Provided, That all appointments—

This refers to this new army—

Provided, That all appointments below the grade of brigadier general in the line of the volunteer forces shall be by commission in an arm of the service and not by commission in any particular regiment.

That throws them into what you might call the general army.

Mr. WARREN. That is the law now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know that, but I am speaking now of the effect that it would have upon the State troops. The State troops want to be commanded by officers who are citizens of their own State, and the officers of the State want to command citizens of their own State, so that they will always give preference to them.

Mr. WARREN. These troops are all militia.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but they are no longer militia when their services have been accepted by the Government. They then become a part of the Army of the United States. It is such things as this to which I think attention should be called. I am very glad that there is a disposition to let the bill go over. I would have felt like apologizing for occupying so much time, except we have nothing else on hand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DALLAS, TEX.

The bill (S. 955) to provide for the extension of the post-office and courthouse building at Dallas, Tex., and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment. On page 2, section 3, line 9, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifty"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, in lieu of the foregoing, to acquire a new site, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, for a post office at Dallas, Tex., at a limit of cost not to exceed $150,000: Provided, That the site so acquired shall be bounded on at least two sides by streets and be of sufficient area to permit of the reservation of a fire limit on all sides of the building to be constructed of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire certain divisions of the pending question, and, in order that there may be no inaccuracy in my motion, I have committed it to writing. I move that a separate vote be taken as follows:

First, to strike from the printed bill as reported by the committee, line 10, page 1, to line 15, page 2, both inclusive, and insert in the free list, after line 8 on page 17, the paragraphs printed in italics on page 17 of the reprint showing my amendments.

Before the Chair rules upon that portion of my motion, I desire to say that the portions sought to be stricken out are those which cover—

Fresh meats—Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats excepting game, 1½ cents per pound.
Bacon and hams, not in tins or jars, 1½ cents per pound.
Meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner, not otherwise herein provided for, 1½ cents per pound.
Canned meats and canned poultry, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Extract of meat, fluid or not, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearine, and animal stearine, 1½ cents per pound.
Tallow, 40 cents per 100 pounds.
Egg yolk, egg albumen, and blood albumen, 7½ per cent ad valorem.

These are the parts of the bill that are sought to be stricken out in that portion of the amendment to which I have referred. The portion sought to be inserted in the free list will be found on page 17 of the reprint of the bill showing my amendments, which portions are a reproduction of the parts I have just recited, with the exception of the dutiable percentages; in other words, it seeks to take meats from the dutiable list and to put them upon the free list, with some inconsequential matters in addition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote will be taken upon the amendment, in the form indicated by the Senator from Iowa, to strike out and insert.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate very briefly upon that portion of the amendment. I begin by saying that I have not believed it to be fair that a vote be taken upon these amendments to-day. I expressed that view yesterday and I reaffirm it to-day. However, I understand the exigency of the matter, and content myself with the protest I have made.

Mr. President, it is proposed in the so-called reciprocal arrangement with Canada that the United States shall admit to her markets all the cattle, all the live animals grown and produced in the Dominion without any duty whatsoever. It is proposed in the same instrument that meat of all kinds, the product of these animals or a part of these animals, shall pay a duty of 1¼ cents per pound. At one and the same blow you strike from the farmer every protection that he has hitherto enjoyed for his product, being live animals, and you refuse to give to the consumer of the manufactured products of live animals the benefit of the reduction you propose to make.

I simply want to reassert again, as I have affirmed more than once, that this provision is for the benefit only of the packers of meats. It can result only in advantage to them. You are taxing or—that is not quite the right word—you are taking from the farmer some of the benefit he now has, and you are transferring it to the packers of Kansas City and of Chicago and of New York and of other centers in which this business is carried on. I have never heard a proposition so indefensible, and I sincerely hope that the people of this country, understanding its injustice, will take measures, whenever they have an opportunity to do so, to correct the flagrant wrong that we are about to inflict upon them.

Now, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays upon this division of the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in voting against this amendment I wish it to be distinctly understood that it is not because I would not like to see a provision for free meats included in this reciprocity agreement, but I think the facts are pretty well known in regard to this matter. The President of the United States and his commissioners were willing to have free meats as a reciprocal provision in the agreement—free entrance both to the United States and to Canada—but the objection arose on the Canadian side. What, then, was done? I am not presuming to speak with any confidential information, but refer to what is generally known to the public.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to ask if the Senator from Ohio could refer us to any official document establishing the fact that our commissioners made that proposition?

Mr. BURTON. Not to any official document, but to a speech made by the President—I have forgotten exactly the place where he made it.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the President has made that explanation, but it did not satisfy my mind, for the reason that, though Canada might have objected to admitting our meat free, she would not have objected to our admitting her meat free.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, that is a question for Congress to decide. It is, of course, not usual in any agreement of this kind to give gratuitous concessions. Every reduction is regarded as entitled to some equivalent.

Mr. BAILEY. You did that in the case of print paper and voted down an amendment to correct it.

Mr. BURTON. That was a very different situation from the one presented here.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes; one affects the newspapers and the other the farmers.

Mr. BURTON. Now, instead of free meats there was a very decided reduction in rates, which, if there is any benefit to the consumer from reciprocal reductions, will be of substantial importance when this agreement is adopted. Again, in the course of trade——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Just one minute. In the course of trade there have been very slight importations of meat from Canada. The tendency is the other way, because our packing industries are so very much more highly organized and because of the larger use of Indian corn and other grain in the feeding of meat-producing animals.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator from Ohio feel that because there have been slight importations from Canada into the United States the duty should therefore still be maintained?

Mr. BURTON. Why, Mr. President, the whole principle of this agreement is one of reciprocity in which, so far as possible, equivalents should be obtained on both sides; and I think in the long run the provisions, which I trust may be supplemented, are better in the shape in which they now are. This is true, because in future negotiations the existing agreement paves the way for the mutual admission of meats free from duties both to the United States and to Canada, while in the form proposed by the amendment there would be free admission to the United States only.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator suggested that there had been material reductions. Let me inquire if the reduction was not from one and one-half to one and one-fourth of a cent per pound?

Mr. BURTON. Well, let us look at the first reduction, as given in Schedule A, on bacon, which is from 4 cents per pound to 1¼ cents per pound. I gave those material reductions in my remarks the other day. On some articles the reduction is only from 1½ to 1¼ cents.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is that on dressed meats.

Mr. BURTON. But, I repeat, on bacon the reduction is from 4 cents to 1¼ cents.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I must be permitted to answer one suggestion just made by the Senator from Ohio before this vote is taken. I believe it to be true that the State Department was willing to grant free meat into the United States from Canada if the Canadian Government had been willing to grant free meat into that Dominion from the United States; and I hope that that will be accepted as one of the bases of our consideration here. The Canadian Government, however, came to the conclusion that its industries could not endure free competition, and therefore declined that proposition. The State Department then refused to admit meat into the United States free, because that would injure the packing industries in the United States, without any equivalent; that is to say, the packers of the United States at once said: "We do not want free meat from Canada into the United States unless we can extend our trade by having free meat into Canada," a very persuasive argument for the packers, but no argument whatsoever for the consumer of meat; no argument whatsoever to satisfy the farmers who must sell their cattle in a free market and buy their meat in a protected market.

I am not, of course, imputing to the State Department any ill motive, and I am not assuming to know what the State Department said to the Canadian commissioners, but I am simply stating what must have been the motive which prevailed in refusing to allow free meat to enter the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Has the Senator from Iowa any information or even the remotest intimation that any representation was made by the packers of the country to the commissioners?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not. But the Senator from Ohio knows that if we are holding our duties on meats in order to secure from Canada a concession of her duties on meats, we are holding those duties in order to benefit our packers, because they are the only ones who could be benefited by the reduction of the duties on meats into Canada. Is not that true?

Mr. BURTON. Contrary to that, is it not true that in every reciprocity treaty made by the United States, whether with Canada or any other country, the utmost effort has been made to secure absolutely uniform reductions and uniform duties just so far as possible? That has been the general principle.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, since the Canadian treaty of 1854, this is the very first effort, so far as I am informed, that the United States has ever made to introduce reciprocal duties on the same articles of the same degree. I do not know of any other treaty in which that attempt has been made.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will.

Mr. BURTON. Was not the prior treaty with Canada negotiated in 1854 and ratified by the House and Senate in 1855 made up of absolutely identical duties and of an absolutely identical free list between the two countries, and is it not the natural course in making any other treaty to follow that example as nearly as is possible?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe it is true of the ill-fated treaty of 1854 that the duties were reciprocal and the free list was reciprocal, but it is the only one of its kind, and it very soon fell under the condemnation of the American people. But in our treaty with Cuba, in our treaty with Hawaii, in our proposed treaties with France and Belgium and the Argentine there never was a thought of trying to make duties reciprocal and admitting articles into one country and the other at the same degree of taxation.

In my opinion it is a fatal mistake for us to pursue any such plan in dealing with Canada. I say that when we give Canada free cattle we will be faithless to our obligation toward the men who produce our cattle if we do not give Canada also free meat.

Holding that view—and I expressed it as fully and as clearly as I could in an address of some extent the other day—I again ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I gave notice a few days ago that I intended on Monday to discuss this bill and pending amendments. I am not going to object to a vote now on the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa, although two of the amendments he has offered are substantially the same as two that I have offered.

I wish to give notice now that while I do not object to a vote on the amendments of the Senator from Iowa, if those amendments which are similar to mine are voted down in Committee of the Whole I shall offer my amendments in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to strike out the part indicated on page 2 and insert in lieu thereof the part indicated on page 17.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], but I understand if he were present he would vote the same way as I intend to vote, and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GUGGENHEIM's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). I ask leave to announce that my colleague is unavoidably absent from the city.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If he were present, I understand he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea." Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. McLEAN's name was called). The junior Senator from Connecticut is absent, and I have been requested to announce that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I was instructed by him that upon these amendments he would vote as I vote, and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], who, I understand, is absent on important public business. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. WATSON's name was called). My colleague has a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. If my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. My colleague is necessarily absent.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to say that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is detained from the Senate by sickness.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I am informed that if the Senator from Arkansas were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. REED. By an inadvertence I cast my vote. It seems there is at least a sort of pair existing between myself and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I desire to withdraw the vote, and to say that I transfer the pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and now desire to vote under those circumstances. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent from the city. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask if a quorum has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not yet been advised by the Secretary. [After a pause.] On this question the yeas are 13, the nays 32.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bailey	Clapp	Gronna	Sutherland
Borah	Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Thornton
Bourne	Cummins	Nelson
Bristow	Dixon	Simmons

NAYS—32.

Brandegee	Curtis	Lippitt	Reed
Bryan	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Shively
Burnham	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Burton	Heyburn	Myers	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Owen	Stone
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Swanson
Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter	Wetmore
Cullom	Jones	Pomerene	Williams

NOT VOTING—45.

Bacon	Frye	Nixon	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Bradley	Gamble	Oliver	Taylor
Briggs	Guggenheim	Overman	Terrell
Brown	Kern	Paynter	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Penrose	Townsend

Culberson	Lodge	Perkins	Watson
Davis	Lorimer	Rayner	Works
Dillingham	McCumber	Richardson
du Pont	McLean	Root
Foster	Newlands	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum has now voted. On this vote the yeas are 14, the nays 32. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. It is apparent that we have a bare quorum here, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas, that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. BAILEY. I dislike to dispute the President's sense of sound, but the vote went by sound and not by count; I believe I will ask for a division.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division ayes 19, noes 28.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that a separate vote be taken upon the following part of the amendments which constitutes the pending question. Strike out from line 1 on page 3 to line 11 on page 4, both inclusive, and insert in the free list the paragraph in italics from lines 1 to 24, both inclusive, on page 18 of the reprint showing my amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 of the bill strike out all from line 1——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Beginning with what words?

The SECRETARY. Beginning with the words "tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn, in cans," down to and including line 11, on page 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ending with what words?

The SECRETARY. Ending with the words "cherry juice and prune juice, or prune wine, and other fruit juices and fruit sirup, nonalcoholic, 17½ per cent ad valorem."

And insert in the free list of the bill the words found in the reprint on page 18, beginning "Tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn," ending with the words "cherry juice and prune juice, or prune wine, and other fruit juices and fruit sirup nonalcoholic."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a correction. If I am not mistaken, on page 3 it commences with line 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa is offering the amendment from the first print of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wanted the RECORD to show what it is in the print of June 20.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read my amendment from the committee print.

Mr. HEYBURN. The print of June 20 is the pending print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate, of course, is acting upon the bill, not upon the reprint, and that is why the Chair asked that the Secretary state the words at the beginning and close of the amendment, so that Senators would thoroughly understand it. The Senator from Iowa has correctly stated the amendment, because he used the print of the bill which the Senate is now working upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I desire a division of the question and a ruling upon that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote will be as requested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for a moment. I did not understand how it was desired to take the vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am simply asking for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to strike out and insert.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am asking for a division, so that we can have a separate vote upon the striking out of the manufactured products of cereals from the dutiable list and putting them in the free list. To do that I strike out from the reciprocal dutiable list beginning at the top of page 3 of the committee print and closing with line 11 on page 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senate before the vote is taken the character of this amendment. According to the bill the following articles bear the following duties:

Tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn, in cans or other air-tight packages, and including the weight of the package, 1½ cents per pound.

Wheat flour and semolina, and rye flour, 50 cents per barrel of 196 pounds.

Oatmeal and rolled oats, including the weight of paper covering, 50 cents per 100 pounds.

Corn meal, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.

Barley malt, 45 cents per 100 pounds.

Barley, pot, pearled, or patent, one-half cent per pound.

Buckwheat flour or meal, one-half cent per pound.

Split peas, dried, 7½ cents per bushel of 60 pounds.

Prepared cereal foods, not otherwise provided for herein, 17½ per cent ad valorem.

Bran, middlings, and other offals of grain used for animal food, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.

Macaroni and vermicelli, 1 cent per pound.

Biscuits, wafers, and cakes, when sweetened with sugar, honey, molasses, or other material, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Biscuits, wafers, cakes, and other baked articles, composed in whole or in part of eggs or any kind of flour or meal, when combined with chocolate, nuts, fruits, or confectionery; also candied peel, candied popcorn, candied nuts, candied fruits, sugar candy, and confectionery of all kinds, 32½ per cent ad valorem.

Maple sugar and maple sirup, 1 cent per pound.

Pickles, including pickled nuts, sauces of all kinds, and fish paste or sauce, 32½ per cent ad valorem.

Cherry juice and prune juice, or prune wine, and other fruit juices and fruit sirup, nonalcoholic, 17½ per cent ad valorem.

These are the manufactured products of the so-called raw material of the farmer and the horticulturist. I have proposed to put them all upon the free list, so far as the United States is concerned, and they will be found on page 18 of the reprint showing my amendments. I believe that page 18 is an exact reproduction of these manufactured articles as found in the reciprocal dutiable list, with the exception of the duties which are prescribed in the latter list. They present very much the same question as the one just voted on.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Can he have any rational hope that a Senate which will say that it is fair to take the tax off of wheat and still leave it on flour, that it is fair to take the tax off of cattle and still leave it on meat is going to vote to free these commodities of the farm and the orchard, the same when they come from the factory as it did when they came from the farm and the orchard?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have but very, very little hope. I still believe, however, in deathbed conversion and repentance. It may be that as we proceed the light of reason and justice will fill this Chamber, and we may find Senators who, although unwilling to admit free meat, having admitted free cattle, will be willing to admit free flour, having admitted free wheat.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to remind the Senator from Iowa that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] declared that the people of this country will never again submit to any tax upon breadstuffs. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] practically declared the same thing. Yet the Senator from Ohio, with that declaration still in the ears of his associates here, votes to keep a tax on breadstuffs. The Senator from Ohio knows as well as the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Texas that the people eat flour, and that they do not eat wheat. Yet he takes the duty off of wheat, which is the form in which the farmer sells it, and still leaves a duty on flour, which is the form in which the people eat it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator from Texas must bear in mind that both the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York state that they hate to do it.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, I can not understand how a man can be made to do what he hates to do. I understand there are potential influences at work here and elsewhere to force this treaty through without amendment, and it looks like they will succeed in doing so; but it shall not go through until these statements which I consider inconsistent are recorded, because the American farmers intend to read this record, and when they do read it I think they will have their own opinions of the consistency of certain Senators.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana, for he rose first.

Mr. DIXON. I wanted to further supplement what the Senator from Texas said by the statement that the amendment upon which we are now voting in no wise invalidates the pending treaty. It does not prevent it from becoming a law. We are merely extending the free list to Canada. It in no way hampers the treaty from going into effect and merely equalizes the injustice that is being perpetrated on the producers of the so-called raw material.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me a minute? He says we are merely extending something to Canada. I am voting for these amendments upon the theory, at least, that we are trying to extend something to the American consumer.

Mr. DIXON. We are extending it to the American consumer as well as to Canada. I wanted to make it apparent——

Mr. BAILEY. That they can not vote against this upon the idea that they might defeat the treaty.

Mr. DIXON. Exactly; and that there can be no possible excuse for voting against this amendment that it will in any way defeat the treaty.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I do not wish to get confused with concessions here. I yield now to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana if he understands, then, why it is that these Senators vote against making this bill so it will carry some relief to those who need it?

Mr. DIXON. It is one of the reasons I have waited for six weeks to understand. It is one of the unexplained propositions which confront the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is a case for the third-degree committee; evidently some one is under duress.

Mr. DIXON. Then I move that this treaty be referred to the third-degree committee, to ascertain the cause of this apparent inconsistency.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I feel now that I must yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] before I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very anxious to hear what the Senator from Ohio will say.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I certainly did not succeed in making the Senator from Texas understand my position. I regard this as an international agreement standing by itself. I spoke upon that so long some three days since that I dislike to take the time of the Senate again. Not only will any change in this agreement endanger the success of our negotiations with Canada, but it will disturb our tariff relations with divers other countries with which we have treaties containing a favored-nation clause.

I am not willing in the light and airy way which has just been manifested in this debate to say that these proposed gratuitous concessions may not give other countries having preferential treatment the right to claim the same treatment for themselves as we might without equivalent grant to Canada. We have maintained the contention that whenever there was an equivalent given in any bargain between ourselves and another country, as, for example, between ourselves and Canada, no other nation, whatever its treaty relations with us might be, could complain; but other countries have not conceded that doctrine, and it requires two to make a bargain. By these amendments, however, it is proposed to grant concessions without any equivalent.

To repeat what I said a few days ago, if we make concessions not granted to Canada in the original agreement, not even requested by her, such a course would, at any rate, create friction and pave the way for the assertion of claims by other countries.

Mr. President, I am very much pleased at the sort of mutual admiration society that has been manifested here among Members on different sides of the aisle. This is a sort of a continuance of the dialogues which occurred several days ago. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] vied with each other in their expressions of honorable intention to amend the tariff. Several quoted Scripture, and the amity was so marked that I was reminded of that old quotation from the Psalms:

> Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Ohio was not present on that occasion.

Mr. BURTON. I think I was. I think I heard the dialogue between the two, at any rate.

But I am afraid that others who are less charitable and desire that any manifestation of affection shall be between persons rather than between abstract qualities will quote another paragraph:

> And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together, for before they were at enmity between themselves.

The problem in my mind, and it is a difficult one, is this: Is all this amity here extending across the line going to get anywhere? Is the Senator from Texas, after all, going to join with the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Idaho, and the Senator from Iowa in any constructive tariff proposition?

Mr. BAILEY. Just as far as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] are going to go.

Mr. BURTON. I am not claiming that I am going along the same path permanently with the Senator from Mississippi. I should like to go with him as far as I can.

Just one word further. This agreement presents a very substantial reduction in duties on flour.

Our duty was 25 per cent. The average price would probably run $4.50 or $5. I always refer to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] for prices of wheat and flour. It differs according to the location and quality of the flour. That, perhaps, would be $1.25 a barrel. The duty on a barrel of flour going into Canada was 60 cents. Now, by mutual agreement it is 50 cents for both countries. In other words, the duty has been reduced from $1.25 to 50 cents on the side of the United States, and from 60 cents to 50 cents on the side of Canada.

It seems to me the most ardent tariff reformer ought to take great satisfaction over so substantial a reduction, and rather than lose the chance of obtaining any agreement at all, a chance which is endangered by amending this bill, he ought to accept what is already vouchsafed. That, I trust, is an answer to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, while the Senator from Ohio is congratulating the country on the reduction of the duty on flour from $1.25 per barrel to 50 cents, why does he not also explain that the reduction on the quantity of wheat required to grind that barrel of flour is from $1.12½ cents to nothing. Now, the Senator from Ohio knows that the duty on wheat was 25 cents a bushel. He likewise knows that it requires 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, and, therefore, that the miller was paying on the imported wheat of a barrel of flour $1.12½ cents, and against that he had protection of $1.25 on the barrel of flour, or a net protection on his flour of 12½ cents per barrel.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Iowa will yield to me there are two conclusive answers to that.

In the first place, the Senator from Texas knows that both the United States and Canada are great exporters of wheat.

Mr. BAILEY. No; the United States are not a great exporter.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; it is a great exporter.

Mr. BAILEY. Why, the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. Under ordinary conditions the price of wheat and the price of flour are not determined in the least degree, save for a very limited area, by that duty of 25 cents.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Why do you take it off then?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio one question? What does he call a limited area? I want to ask him if he calls the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Iowa a very limited section—as large as 20 Ohios?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I would give my enthusiastic tribute to the locality mentioned by the Senator from North Dakota. It is a most magnificent empire——

Mr. MCCUMBER. I was not asking for a tribute. I was asking the Senator's opinion as to what he regarded a very limited area.

Mr. BURTON. Under normal conditions the effect of that duty would not extend one tier of counties into those States.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Under normal conditions! That condition has extended for 10 years over every section of that country.

Mr. BURTON. I must differ with the Senator from North Dakota, though I concede his greater familiarity, both as to the facts and to the normality, if I may use the word, as to conditions.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator may differ——

Mr. BURTON. I want to say one thing further. At very considerable length I dwelt upon the fact the other day, and I fear I am trespassing again upon the good nature of the Senate, that the result of removing those tariff barriers would be to approximate, yes, to make equal, the price on the two sides.

If there is free intercourse between the two countries and only a very small fraction of the wheat is consumed in the counties in which it is raised—and even that production, as in North Dakota, your own State, is sent to Minneapolis to be ground—if, I say, wheat has to be sent away somewhere for a market, it may be to Hamburg or some place four or five thousand miles, who is there who believes that the price will be a mere county or State matter? It is a great question of international trade; a great question of prices fixed the world over. It does not change trade laws if you should bring in the warehouse receipts here and show that at some time you paid 13 cents more for Dakota wheat than for Canadian wheat. That was due to artificial conditions that would be wiped out the moment reciprocity existed.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that be true, why not let in free flour?

Mr. BAILEY. Flour is wheat in its consumable form.

Mr. BURTON. If it did not endanger the agreement, if it were not contrary to the form in which it was framed, if it did not endanger our tariff relations with other countries, I would most cordially join with the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why not free flour from the whole world?

Mr. BURTON. If we want free flour from the whole world, let us take up the question courageously as an independent proposition and do not try to put it as a rider on an international agreement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Ohio will excuse me. I am sure he has put his views already before the Senate. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BURTON. I had not quite finished my answer to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CUMMINS. And probably you will never be able to.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know about that.

Mr. BAILEY. The only thing I want to say to the Senate is that in one breath the Senator from Ohio congratulates the country that the duty on flour has been reduced from $1.25 to 50 cents per barrel, and parades that as one of the blessings and benefactions of this treaty; and then, when pressed why he does not apply the same treatment to wheat, he says that the duty does not affect the price of wheat, and yet he knows that flour is simply wheat in a consumable form.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Texas——

Mr. BAILEY. If it be true that a reduction in the duty on flour will reduce the price of flour, why is it not true that a reduction of the duty on wheat will reduce the price of wheat?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Texas must excuse me. I was interrupted. The interruptions were somewhat multiplied before I had finished my answer. I do not believe that it would influence the price of flour materially, save under certain conditions, relating especially to localities and to occasional scarcity. I dwelt upon that subject at length here recently.

Mr. BAILEY. Then why do you tell the country and the Senate that you have done a great thing in reducing the duty on flour? Did you desire to make them believe that this was better than it is?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Texas should know——

Mr. BAILEY. He does not know.

Mr. BURTON. That I have a record on this subject. I have not said anything of the kind to the country or to the Senate. I distinctly stated here three days ago just the contrary of what the Senator has now been seeking to place in my mouth. I do not expect that a reduction of these and other duties will make any very great decrease. It will, however, improve conditions by widening our area of trade between peoples under similar conditions, just as the Louisiana Purchase and California annexation and that of Florida, I think, widened our commercial horizon.

One further point and then I will be through. Of course, the Senator from Texas disagrees with me on another proposition. I believe in a graded scale as between the raw material and the finished product.

Mr. BAILEY. On everything except fuller's earth. You are not in favor of free fuller's earth.

Mr. BURTON. I have forgotten about that. I have not discussed the question for some time.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not forgotten about it.

Mr. BURTON. I think fuller's earth is not coming in in a very great quantity.

Mr. BAILEY. No; for you have kept it out with a duty.

Mr. BURTON. I remember now the question was whether fuller's earth was in an improved condition, was developed from its primary condition as a raw material.

If the Senator will allow me, I am inclined to think that in any reform or reduction of the tariff progress can be made, if it is desired, by removing the duties on raw material and then commensurate duties on the finished product. I do not believe there is any reason for any duty on flour in this country; but let us take that product up, if we take it up, in a bill by itself, and not try to remove the duties here in this reciprocal agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now feel compelled to yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. Just a word. I want to try to be consistent in my position respecting this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, you must quit being a Republican.

Mr. SMOOT. I can be consistent and be a Republican, too, in this matter.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Texas he is not consistent himself in advocating the ideas expressed by him this afternoon, judged by the Democratic thought on the other side, because he is entirely out of harmony with the great majority of Democratic Senators.

Mr. BAILEY. Describe that as a majority, but not as Democratic thought.

Mr. SMOOT. I said the great majority. That is the expression I used. I expect to be consistent in this whole matter. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not believe in free trade in raw materials.

Mr. BURTON. Excuse me for interrupting the Senator, Mr. President. I do not say that we should have free trade in raw materials immediately or by drastic reductions, at least in cases in which conditions are different. What I do say is that in any progress toward tariff reform the natural beginning is with raw material and food products.

Mr. BAILEY. What do you mean by tariff reform?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not propose to vote for free wheat. I do not propose to vote for free cattle. I am not voting for free trade, and when I vote against these amendments I do so with the distinct understanding that I do not wish to record my vote as favoring free trade on the articles included in the amendments.

I am going to vote against the bill. I do not believe in it, and I wish it could be defeated. Therefore I think I am consistent in voting against the amendments and the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah thinks that the bill will pass, does he not?

Mr. SMOOT. I am afraid it will.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore does he not think it is his duty to make it as just as possible, even bad as it is?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hardly like to say that the bill would be more just with the amendments. I do not think the bill is just in any particular——

Mr. CUMMINS. There are degrees of justice.

Mr. SMOOT. With the amendments or without them. Therefore I am going to vote against them all.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Utah has evidently failed to read the majority report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. They recognize the fact that injustice has been done to the farmer. They say so in their report. I ask the Senator from Ohio to point out to me what he means by free raw material when he refers to wheat. How much of a bushel of wheat is free raw material?

Mr. BURTON. Of course the term "free raw material" is one to which you can give no exact definition. It means in a general way that which comes in its first or elementary form from the earth, such as the products of the soil and minerals from the mine.

I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that there is another reason why I class wheat with raw material and in a category by itself, namely, its very essential connection with the food supply of the people, which I think places it in an exceptional position with most other food products.

Mr. President, I am not now saying what I should favor if there were actual need of a duty on wheat, or if there were need of a duty on cattle, coming from Canada, or yet if there were any rational basis for such a duty. I would not favor a ruthless casting down of tariff barriers in any case, but I tried to prove the other day that there was no very serious need of duties on the Canadian products admitted by this proposed agreement, and I stand by the views then expressed.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, can the Senator give us any idea as to the cost of producing a bushel of wheat and the amount of labor that is required?

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that I have analyzed the actual cost. The fact is that you can not fix the cost of production and make it uniform throughout the United States, because it differs widely in various localities. I think it would be useless to attempt to bring here any figures about the cost of producing wheat. It is perfectly evident that it is a profitable crop, for it is raised on a very large scale throughout the United States and was raised even when a large share had to be sent abroad.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not true that there has been testimony submitted to the Finance Committee that the labor cost per bushel of producing wheat in this country runs all the way from 59 cents to 75 cents?

Mr. BURTON. Were the witnesses cross-examined?

Mr. GRONNA. The witnesses were cross-examined.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But not under oath.

Mr. GRONNA. Not under oath, of course.

Mr. BURTON. That may be one view in regard to it. The safest test, however, is not an estimate as to what it costs, but what the course of production is—whether or not people conclude it is best to raise it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, whether wheat growers become millionaires, as wheat millers do.

Mr. BURTON. I am not defending the millers; but so far as individual millers are concerned—and there are quite a number of them in my State—I should like to have the name of one who has become a millionaire. On the other hand, I know of a great many who have failed and gone out of business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not familiar with conditions in Ohio, but I know something about them elsewhere, and I am sure that the business of grinding wheat into flour has not been an unprofitable business in the United States, or in our locality, and that that business can just as well afford the loss of the duties which I here propose to take from it as can the business of growing wheat. I can assure the Senator from Ohio that the millers will still survive, and I believe will be fairly prosperous.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is very evident that there is a disposition to further discuss this amendment, which is probably one of the most important amendments, if not the most important amendment, to be offered to this bill. As I have said this morning, a few days ago I gave notice that I would address the Senate on Monday on these amendments. It is chiefly upon this particular amendment that I desire to speak on Monday. I do not want to have to speak to-day before the time I have given notice that I would speak, because I am not prepared. I have not with me the data that I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate, and I would not be able to discuss the question with that fairness and fullness with which I would like to discuss it and which I think its importance demands.

Mr. President, in that condition, if the Senator from Iowa will not object, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the votes on the amendments be postponed until Monday, and that during the legislative day of Monday this amendment and all other amendments to the agreement be voted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have twice made a similar proposition, and each time it has been rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I tried very hard yesterday to show the Senate that it would be unfair to the Senator from North Carolina and unfair to the proposer of these amendments to compel a vote upon them to-day. My appeal, however, fell upon deaf ears, and therefore I want the Senator from North Carolina to know, as I am sure he does know, that I am not in anywise responsible for insisting upon a vote upon these amendments to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that. I happened to be temporarily out of the Chamber when the matter was first brought up this morning.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I desire to say in response to the Senator from Iowa that he did make a request that the amendments which he has offered and which are now pending should be taken up on Monday.

Mr. CUMMINS. My first request was Tuesday.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator changed it to Monday.

Mr. CUMMINS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. SIMMONS. And I announced my purpose to speak Monday, with the understanding that these amendments were to go over until after I had spoken.

Mr. STONE. It is unimportant whether the request was for Tuesday or Monday. The Senator did prefer such a request, coupling with it a further request that any division of the amendments desired might be had, and that the yeas and nays might be considered as ordered. There occurred a colloquy in reference to the request in an effort to see whether it could be modified in some respects, as, for instance, that an hour might be fixed at which the voting might be commenced. During that very peaceful and amiable colloquy the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] called the attention of the Senator from Iowa to some rule of the Senate relating to the division of questions pending.

There was no objection made by any Senator to the request of the Senator from Iowa, but in a somewhat petulant mood, greatly to the surprise of many of us, for up to that time we had been proceeding, as I have said, in an amiable way, apparently, and were about to reach some conclusion, the Senator waved his hand somewhat petulantly and spoke in a tone that was a little petulant and said, "I have made one more vain attempt to get an agreement, and I now withdraw the request." Immediately a motion was made to adjourn.

I have no reason to believe, if the Senator had been sufficiently patient and sufficiently anxious to have an agreement to have permitted the Chair to have put the question to the Senate, that there would have been any objection to it; and I hardly think it is fair to have it go into the RECORD and, to some extent, to the country that the Senate and the friends of this measure were not disposed to treat the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from North Carolina fairly. I do not think such a conclusion is warranted by the facts.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Virginia informs me that he desires to prefer a request.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Virginia does that, I want to state to the Senate that I know some Senators are absent to-day who would not have absented themselves had they not been under the impression that there would be no vote upon these amendments until Monday. I know at least one Senator who is away with that understanding, and I understand that with him are quite a number of Senators.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very sorry if it appeared to the Senator from Missouri that I withdrew the request in a petulant way; I was not conscious of any such feeling. I have observed, however, the Senator from Missouri very carefully in a brief experience in the Senate, and I felt sure that what he was doing and what he was saying was a premonition that I was not to be granted the consent for which I asked. Therefore I withdrew the request. I think the Senator from Missouri must do me the justice to believe, at least, that I was not acting in a revengeful or resentful way. I felt absolutely certain that I would not be granted the consent for which I asked; it was growing late; and I did not care to keep the Senate longer in session. So much in reply to the Senator from Missouri.

I have no objection whatever to a unanimous-consent agreement, properly phrased, for voting upon these amendments or this series of amendments on Monday or on Tuesday, but I will not agree, so far as I am concerned, to fixing an hour when the voting is to begin.

Mr. SIMMONS. The request was that they be voted on upon the legislative day, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. The peculiar character of the amendments and their importance will involve some discussion as each division of the question arises, and therefore I shall not consent to an hour being fixed that would cut off debate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am very sorry to hear the Senator from Iowa object to fixing an hour for voting. I was about to ask unanimous consent that an hour be fixed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not agree to that, as the Senator from Virginia will see at once. I have offered a series of amendments. They form a completed whole, but they must be voted upon separately. I feel it to be my duty to explain, as each division arises, just what it embraces. And I could not, therefore, agree to begin voting at a particular hour and continue until all the amendments were voted upon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the Senator from Iowa will recall that I approached him this morning with the suggestion that, if he considered it unfair to him or to his amendments that there should be any vote to-day, I did not think there was any disposition on this side of the Chamber to insist on such a procedure, provided we could come to an agreement by which we would make real progress in the consideration of this measure. I left the Senator from Iowa with the impression that a request for unanimous consent would be made which without specifying any hour would fix Monday before adjournment as the time when all the amendments offered by him should be voted on. Later on I was informed that he objected to such a request being made of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator from Virginia has been misinformed. I did not object and do not object.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] was my informant. I had an understanding with him that he would make the request, but he told me later that he would not do so, because the Senator from Iowa preferred that he should not. It took me by surprise, for I had confidently expected that such a request would be made and granted. The Senator from Illinois is now in his seat.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Illinois misconstrued what I said. I said to the Senator from Illinois that I did not request him or any other Senator to make the suggestion for unanimous consent, and I do not do so now.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. As I have been referred to, I simply desire to say that I came here this morning feeling that possibly I might assist in bringing about a better understanding and aid in securing an agreement to vote upon what are known as the Cummins amendments. I talked with the Senator from Iowa about the matter, and he told me, as I understood him, that he preferred that I should do nothing about it at that time. I so reported to the Senator from Virginia, and dropped the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I told the Senator from Illinois that I preferred that he should not do anything of that sort at my suggestion. That was what I intended at least.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not understand the Senator to use the words "at my suggestion." I understood the Senator to state the fact that he would prefer that I should not do anything at that time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. Of course I am not responsible for the way in which the Senator from Illinois understood what I said. What I intended to say——

Mr. CULLOM. I certainly did not hear the Senator use the words "at my suggestion," as he now says he did. He may have used them, but I did not hear him do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. The attitude I have taken is that I would not again ask for unanimous consent for a time to vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I simply desired to have the Senator from Iowa fully assured not only that I, but, so far as I know, all the Senators on this side of the Chamber had no desire to insist on a course that would subject him to any disadvantage or any inconvenience. I told the Senator that I expected to vote against his amendments, but that I wanted him to understand that we wanted them fairly presented to the Senate; that he had bestowed much time and thought on them, and I felt that it was due him that he should have every opportunity to have his amendments fairly presented to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa is not at this time asking anything but a vote, nor has he done so at any time this morning. I have not suggested the postponement of this matter. When the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] came to me a few moments ago, I told him I was not responsible for voting upon these amendments to-day.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is true the Senator from Iowa did not ask for a postponement, but he did say as soon as he took the floor this morning that he considered it exceedingly unfair——

Mr. CUMMINS. I did say that and I do consider the matter in that light.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And I wanted him to understand that if there was any unfairness it was accomplished by his own objection to the request being made to the Senate. I believe if he had not withdrawn his request yesterday it would have been acceded to, and I think if he would have been willing for the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to make a request this morning it would have been acceded to. Certainly, so far as I know, there was a disposition to accede to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what the disposition has been. I only know my part in it; that is all.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I should like to make a little further explanation. On yesterday, when we concluded the attempt to secure an agreement, I felt greatly disappointed that we did not come to an understanding. I felt that if the Senator from Iowa had not suddenly thrown up his hands with the announcement that he had nothing further to say, and if he had not withdrawn his request, we would in a little while have come to an agreement. I do not lodge any complaint against the Senator; but I came in this morning desiring to do fairly by the Senator and to get an agreement if we could. If I had been authorized to make, or he had consented that I should again make, the request, I should have been as liberal as possible in trying to get an agreement, so that we might end the controversy and get a vote at some future time upon the amendments which the Senator has offered. I do not make any complaint against the Senator at all, except that I felt he was a little bit out of humor on account of his failure to get such an agreement as he suggested and therefore withdrew the request suddenly and left us without any agreement at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have not been out of humor myself at any time, and I am not now, but I am exceedingly anxious to meet the views and conform to the reasonable convenience of all Senators. I therefore now ask that unanimous consent be given that a vote be taken on Monday next before adjournment on all of the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and all of the amendments offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I hope that will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator certainly means the legislative day of Monday.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Of course I mean the legislative day. I say Monday, but for our purposes Monday does not terminate so long as the legislative day continues; and I am perfectly willing to say the legislative day of Monday.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that such an agreement shall be made. It must be understood, however, that the right of division of my amendments remains.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is the parliamentary right of the Senator from Iowa, as explained by the Chair on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that on the legislative day of Monday, July 10, 1911, before adjournment, all of the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] be voted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one question. I want to ask the Senator from Virginia if his request includes all the amendments to the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The request did not include that. I would be glad if all amendments could be included, but I realize the impracticability of that. I do not believe such a request would be acceded to. We all know that there are amendments to the bill under preparation which will be offered and which will be debated, and we can not assume that Senators who are bestowing time on such amendments will agree to vote on them on Monday. My request for unanimous consent simply applies to the amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from North Carolina, though I repeat I would gladly go further if I considered it practicable; but I do not consider it practicable, and I want to make some headway toward the disposition of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. What is the request? Let us have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that on the legislative day of Monday, July 10, 1911, before adjournment, the Senate vote upon all amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that that instantly transfers until Monday the vote just ordered upon the division of my amendment that has been under discussion for the last few minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that is understood.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL, late a Representative from the State of Kansas, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read:

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 8, 1911.

Resolved, That the House has heard with regret and profound sorrow of the death of ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL, Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Kansas.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral at Lawrence, Kans., and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 99), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of the Hon. ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL, late a Representative from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 10, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 8, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. N. H. Holmes, D. D., of Pittsburg, Pa., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God, Thou who art the same to-day, yesterday, and forever, help us to worship Thee. We devoutly pray for Thy blessing to rest upon every section of our broad land, and upon these, its Representatives, and upon him who guides and presides over their deliberations. Grant, we beseech of Thee, that they may all have wisdom and strength from on high to discharge their manifold duties—duties freighted with far-reaching responsibilities and consequences—as in the sight of God. Let Thy fatherly goodness, we pray Thee, and Thy kind providence be extended toward the friends and loved ones of this House, and grant that such as are separated one from another may be kept far from harm and danger and sorrow. O Lord God Almighty, visit this morning the stricken home in Kansas where has gone to his last home one of the Members of this House. Our Father, Thy word teaches us to pray for all in authority, and we gladly pray for all those in authority in every State and Territory in our Union, and for our President. God bless him, and guide him in the Nation's affairs over which he presides, and prosper his measures for universal peace. And now, O Lord, take us all and keep us by Thy power through faith unto salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 5, 1911, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 12109. An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2208. An act appropriating additional funds for the erection of a public building at the city of Alliance, in the State of Ohio;

S. 2789. An act to change the location and straighten the course of the channel of the Grand Calumet River through the lands of the Gary Land Co. and the Indiana Steel Co., and for other purposes; and

S. 2932. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the old post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., and, in the event of such sale, to enter into a contract for the construction of a suitable post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., without additional cost to the Government of the United States.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2789. An act to change the location and straighten the course of the channel of the Grand Calumet River through the lands of the Gary Land Co. and the Indiana Steel Co., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

S. 2932. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the old post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., and in the event of such sale, to enter into a contract for the construction of a suitable post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., without additional cost to the Government of the United States; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 2208. An act appropriating additional funds for the erection of a public building at the city of Alliance, in the State of Ohio; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 2462. An act to cede jurisdiction to the State of Georgia over certain land in Fulton County; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also the following House bill with Senate amendments:

H. R. 12109. An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, which has been reported from the Senate with Senate amendments, be printed with the Senate amendments, and that the bill with the amendments lie on the Speaker's table until the next meeting of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks that the bill with the Senate amendments be printed and lie on the Speaker's table until the next meeting of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the first part of the request, that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments, but under the rule the bill ought to go to the committee, and not lie on the Speaker's table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is a deficiency bill, and Mr. FITZGERALD, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is not here to-day, and I think he desires that unanimous consent be given to nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate. The purpose of the request of the gentleman from Georgia was to expedite the consideration of the deficiency bill and prevent delay. Of course, if there is objection, it will have to be sent to the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is the usual course to secure unanimous consent for that purpose—that the bill lie on the table until the next meeting of the House. Of course, the Senate amendments upon subjects which have not been considered by the House would, on objection by anyone or on motion, have to be referred to the committee in which the bill originated.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand that, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia. But I understand that the purpose of gentlemen on the other side is to adjourn until next Wednesday, and this bill, if it is to be treated as it ought to be, should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and be reported back by next Wednesday. The request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from Georgia would be as pertinent then as now. I shall have to insist.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the bill will lie on the Speaker's table.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; I will say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a House bill with Senate amendments proposing new appropriations, and therefore it goes automatically to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARTLETT. If objection is made when unanimous consent is asked, it goes there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania states he will object, so that that carries it to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill goes to the Committee on Appropriations, and will be printed with the amendments, so that the Members can get a fair idea about its contents.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GRAY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

TRUSTEES OF COLUMBIA HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following appointments: Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, of Michigan, vice Mr. Sturgiss, of West Virginia, and Mr. FOSTER of Illinois, reappointed to succeed himself, on the board of trustees of Columbia Hospital.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL WEDNESDAY NEXT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Wednesday next. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

THE LATE HON. ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL, OF KANSAS.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to announce the death of one of the Members of this House, Mr. MITCHELL, from the second district of Kansas, who died yesterday morning and whose funeral will take place to-morrow afternoon at Lawrence, Kans. I desire, in the absence of any member of the delegation from Kansas, all of whom left the city last night in order to be present at the funeral, to offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 236.

Resolved, That the House has heard with regret and profound sorrow of the death of ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL, Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Kansas.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral at Lawrence, Kans., and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The question being taken, the resolution was unanimously agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. RUBEY, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. TRIBBLE, Mr. BOOHER, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. LOBECK, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. MURDOCK, Mr. MADISON, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. REES, Mr. JACKSON, and Mr. YOUNG of Kansas.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to our deceased colleague, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, July 12, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Bridgeport Harbor, Conn. (H. Doc. No. 89); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to House resolution of June 15, 1911, information relative to charges of misconduct on the part of officers of the Pay Department since January 1, 1905 (H. Doc. No. 90); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2385) granting an increase of pension to William J. Ramsey, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LAFEAN: A bill (H. R. 12356) donating obsolete bronze cannon to Major Jenkins Post, No. 99, Grand Army of the Republic, Hanover, Pa.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WEEKS: A bill (H. R. 12357) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RODDENBERY: A bill (H. R. 12358) making it unlawful to collect or receipt for the special tax for the purpose of carrying on the business of wholesale liquor dealer or retail liquor dealer in communities where State or local laws forbid the sale of such intoxicating or spirituous liquors; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12359) to prohibit the use of the United States mails for the purpose of advertising, soliciting, or offering for sale intoxicating liquors in communities where State or local laws forbid the sale of such intoxicating or spirituous liquors; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 12360) to divide the State of Oregon into two judicial districts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 12361) providing for the establishment and operation of a Government owned and controlled line of steamers along the Pacific coast and through the Panama Canal and making provisions therefor; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A bill (H. R. 12362) concerning taxable costs in suits at law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12363) providing that questions of negligence and contributory negligence shall be submitted to the jury; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12364) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Opelika, Ala.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12365) to allow and regulate amendments in judicial proceedings in the courts of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12366) to revive the right of action under the captured and abandoned property acts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12367) to provide for the refunding of cotton tax; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COX of Indiana: Resolution (H. Res. 237) calling for information from the President; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LINDBERGH: Resolution (H. Res. 238) authorizing the Monetary Commission to investigate financial institutions or corporations and report whether they operate in restraint of trade and in violation of law; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. COOPER: Memorial joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to enact a law imposing a suitable license or other fee upon crafts navigating the Great Lakes and contiguous waters; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, memorial joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to initiate or participate in a general world-wide movement through The Hague Tribunal or otherwise for international peace and general disarmament and the international policing of the high seas; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri (by request): Memorial memorializing Congress to initiate or participate in a general world-wide movement through The Hague Tribunal or otherwise, for international peace and general disarmament and the international policing of the high seas; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412, the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], upon which he demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Lodge	Reed
Bailey	Cummins	McCumber	Root
Borah	Curtis	McLean	Shively
Bourne	Foster	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Brandegee	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Briggs	Gronna	Myers.	Stone
Bristow	Guggenheim	Nelson	Sutherland
Brown	Heyburn	Nixon	Swanson
Burnham	Hitchcock	Oliver	Taylor
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Thornton
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Watson
Chilton	Jones	Penrose	Wetmore
Clapp	Kenyon	Perkins	Williams
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Poindexter
Crane	Lippitt	Pomerene

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Journal has been approved?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal has been read and approved.

Mr. BAILEY. I then merely desire to incorporate in the RECORD the statement that on Saturday last, when the vote was taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I overlooked the fact that I was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Unmindful of that pair, I voted on the roll call. Fortunately it made no difference in the result.

I believe I owe this statement to the Senator from Massachusetts, who, in his absence, relied upon me to keep the pair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] desired to speak before the vote was taken. After he has been heard I wish to occupy a few moments in reply to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina then is recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before I begin the analysis which I shall attempt to make of this treaty agreement, so called, I want briefly to outline my contentions with reference to it; and that I may be specific in my statements I will read the propositions which I shall attempt to establish.

First. I shall contend that while this bill puts farm products from Canada on the free list it, in effect, increases the protection on the manufactures of those products.

Second. That the tariff duties retained on manufactures, other than manufactures of farm products from Canada, are more protective as against the Canadian importer than the duties levied by the Payne-Aldrich bill upon those commodities are as against Great Britain, France, Germany, and Belgium, our real competitors in these commodities.

Third. I shall contend that by this arrangement the price of many of the staple products of the farm will be reduced, and the benefit of this reduction will inure to the trust manufacturers of these products, while the consumers, in whose benefit we are presumed to be revising the tariff, will receive no part of the benefit of the reduction made on either farm or manufactured products.

Fourth. I shall contend that the effect of this treaty, so far as it is to be regarded as an attempt at revision of the tariff, is a revision against the farmer and the landowner in the interest of the newspapers, the railroads, the packers, the millers, the brewers, and a few other trusts and tariff-protected manufacturers, while the general consumer will receive no benefit by way of lessened cost of the necessaries of life.

Fifth. I shall contend that while the farmer and the landowner pay the price of the concessions made both by us and by Canada in this bill, it contains no provision for compensating him in whole or in part for the losses he sustains.

Sixth. I shall contend that the bill should be amended, as proposed in the amendments I have introduced, by putting meats and flour of different kinds on the free list, so that the consumer may get the benefit of reductions in prices of farm products; and that, as the farmer will pay the price of the concessions made by both countries, he should be compensated, as far as may be, by putting the things he buys upon the free list, as provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Whether these contentions and these conclusions are correct or not will depend upon the facts.

I shall therefore address myself to a discussion of the facts relating to the changes which this treaty makes in our present tariff.

Will putting the staple farm products on the free list reduce the price of those products?

In discussing this question I shall direct my attention chiefly to the effect of these reductions upon wheat, barley, and live stock, not only because they are the products out of which the people's foodstuffs are made, but because they are the products most discriminated against in this agreement and which have been most discussed in this debate.

And first, Mr. President, I will direct my attention to wheat.

It is claimed by the advocates of this treaty, especially by the President, that putting wheat from Canada on the free list will not affect the domestic price of wheat in this country, because it is claimed we are exporters of wheat and that, therefore, the domestic price is fixed by the world's demand—that is, the Liverpool price.

Do the facts sustain the contention of the advocates of this bill and the President?

It is true we still export some wheat, but very little, and the quantity is rapidly diminishing year by year. In 1910 we made an enormous wheat crop—725,000,000 bushels—but exported in that year only about 46,000,000 bushels, and during the first 10 months of this year, practically the whole year for this purpose, our exports of wheat amounted to only 22,000,000 bushels. To be exact, Mr. President, I submit tables taken from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture.

Exports of wheat.

(Annual Report Commerce and Navigation for 1910, p. 508.)

	Bushels.
1908	100,371,057
1909	66,923,244
1910	46,679,876
1911 (10 months ending April, advance sheets)	21,479,608

Exports of flour.

(Annual Report Commerce and Navigation for 1910, p. 508.)

	Barrels.
1908	13,927,247
1909	10,521,161
1911 (10 months ending April, advance sheets)	8,366,726

These reports show that while in 1908 we exported 100,000,000 bushels of wheat during 10 months of the year ending June, 1911, we exported only about 22,000,000 bushels, or about one-fifth of what we exported two years ago. They also show that our exports of flour have fallen off. While in 1908 we exported 13,000,000 barrels, in 1910 we exported only a little over 8,000,000 barrels.

But more important than these facts, as affecting the question under consideration, is the fact that practically all of our exports of wheat for the last few years have been of the lower grades of wheat, most of it known as macaroni wheat. This grade of wheat, I concede, is on an export basis, but the amount in 1910 exported was only about one-twentieth of our total production, while the amount exported this year will hardly exceed one twenty-fifth of our production.

We consume at home practically all of our high-grade wheat, known as No. 1 northern and southern red. It is needed to supply the domestic demand, and as this constitutes more than nineteen-twentieths of all the wheat we produce, the domestic price is but little affected by the export price.

In this statement, Mr. President, I am supported by the yearly reports of the Agricultural Department and by the testimony of practically all of the witnesses who appeared before the Finance Committee to give testimony upon this subject.

I have here a table—I have taken it from statistics compiled by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture—showing that the average price of wheat in this country in 1910 was $1.14 a bushel. This table gives the price of wheat in this country, month by month, for the year 1910, and then estimates what the average of that price is, and the average is found to be $1.14. This table also gives the average price of wheat during that year in Liverpool, month by month; and the average price in Liverpool, according to this table, is identically the same as the average price in this country—$1.14. The export price, of course, is the Liverpool price less the cost of transportation from the domestic port to Liverpool.

The cost of transportation of wheat from Duluth, which has been the export point for the great wheat-producing section of this country, for the year 1910 and in recent years, has averaged, including insurance and so on, about 15 cents a bushel. Therefore, Mr. President, if the domestic price of wheat in this country were upon an export basis or had been upon an export basis last year, that price would have been 99 cents a bushel. So it is shown conclusively by these statistics that the average domestic price of wheat in this country for 1910 was 15 cents higher than the export price.

The table I refer to is as follows:

Range of cash prices, per bushel, of No. 1 northern.

Months.	Minneapolis.	Liverpool.
1910.
January	$1.10-$1.16	$1.22-$1.24
February	1.10- 1.16	1.20- 1.23
March	1.12- 1.16	1.19- 1.22
April	1.06- 1.16	1.18- 1.23
May	1.03- 1.14	1.00- 1.14
June	1.02- 1.17	1.02- 1.10
July	1.13- 1.29	1.10- 1.27
August	1.09- 1.23	1.21- 1.25
September	1.09- 1.15	1.19- 1.24
October	1.02- 1.12	1.14- 1.19
November	.99- 1.07	1.07- 1.11
December	1.00- 1.06	1.07- 1.09
Average	1.14	1.14

To further illustrate, Mr. President, let me take the condition of the wheat market in my State. It may not be known that we produce 7,000,000 bushels of wheat in North Carolina. It is a high-grade wheat. It may not be quite equal in quality to No. 1 northern, but if at all it is only a fraction below it. I have taken the pains to ascertain from the Agricultural Department what wheat in my State sold for on the farm (they could not furnish me the price at the mill), month by month, in the year 1910.

In response to my inquiry the statistician of the Department of Agriculture advised me that the average farm value of wheat in North Carolina for the year 1910 was by months as follows:

	Cents.
January	110
February	127
March	129
April	129
May	130
June	127
July	123
August	119
September	112
October	113
November	112

The average of these monthly prices is, for the year, 121 cents per bushel.

The actual cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Greensboro to Liverpool is about 17 cents, as shown by documents I have in my possession. But let us put it at the same as from Duluth—15 cents. If the price of wheat in North Carolina had been on the export basis in 1910, it would have averaged in that year in North Carolina 15 cents less than the Liverpool price.

The average price of wheat in Liverpool during 1910 was $1.14, so that if the price of wheat in North Carolina had been on an export basis, it would have sold for 99 cents a bushel, whereas, as a matter of fact, it sold for $1.21 a bushel, or 22 cents per bushel above the export price.

Mr. President, while the domestic price of high-grade wheat, the kind we consume in this country, ranges from year to year from 10 to 15 cents above the export price, the price of wheat in Canada is and has long been upon an export basis; and hence the domestic price of Canadian wheat is necessarily from 10 to 15 cents a bushel lower than ours.

I have a table sustaining this statement with regard to the domestic price of wheat in Canada. This table, which is the market report of the price of wheat in Winnipeg for each week in the year 1910, shows that the average price of wheat at Winnipeg for that year was about $1 a bushel.

It will be seen from this statement that the average domestic price of wheat in Canada in 1910 was 14 cents below the average domestic price in this country.

This table is so long that I do not reproduce it. It is in conformity with the testimony of the witnesses.

In further support of my contention in this regard, I wish to read to the Senate extracts from the testimony before the Finance Committee of Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. Lyon, gentlemen who showed great familiarity with this subject. I am laying stress upon these facts because the President in all of his speeches of recent date has recognized the importance of convincing the farmer that the price of his wheat was upon the Liverpool or export basis, and therefore the reduction contained in this bill of the duty on wheat could not possibly affect the price of his product. If the President's premises were correct, his conclusion was correct, and therefore, Mr. President, I am taking the time of the Senate in trying to demonstrate, as I think I shall do and have already in part done, the inaccuracy of his premises and of those other advocates of this bill who have followed that same line of argument. I shall read first from Mr. Wilkinson's testimony. It is very short:

Mr. WILKINSON. The Winnipeg wheat goes over to Europe, to Liverpool, which has been the chief market.

I make the statement that the wheat of Canada, the value of the wheat of Canada at Port Arthur, has been based on what it would bring on the British market in Liverpool. I make this further statement, that the Duluth market has averaged from 5 to 15 cents per bushel during that five years more for our No. 1 northern wheat in Duluth than the Canadian No. 1 northern has brought at Port Arthur.

Port Arthur is the exporting point of Canada. Duluth is the exporting point of the United States. They are separated only by Lake Superior, and, according to the testimony of this witness, coming from that section of the country, claiming to be, and shown by his testimony to be, familiar with wheat conditions and prices in that country, the Port Arthur price of wheat—that is, the Canadian price—was, and has been for the last five years, from 5 to 15 cents a bushel less than the price of wheat at Duluth, the American export point, just on the other side of the lake.

Continuing, Mr. Wilkinson said:

Minnesota No. 1, northern grade, is wheat that must weigh 58 pounds to the bushel; it must grade that; it must contain, say, not less than 1 per cent over half hard wheat, the majority—I think that the term in the law is "the majority."

* * * * * * *

No. 1 northern wheat, Manitoba grade, must be sound wheat that weighs 60 pounds to the bushel. Now, with anybody in the wheat business, anybody that knows anything about the wheat business or who has ever been in the wheat business, knows that there is a great difference in the quality of the wheat when you increase it 2 pounds to the bushel. In addition to that, it must have over 90 per cent of hard wheat in it, so you can see the difference between the two grades of wheat. Their wheat is usually better than ours. Consequently, if the grade of wheat was the same at both places, the difference in the price would be accentuated and increased from 3 to 4 cents per bushel more.

That is to say, Mr. President, if our wheat were of the same quality and weight and intrinsic value as the Canadian wheat, instead of a difference of 15 cents per bushel, there would be a difference of from 18 to 19 cents a bushel between the price of Canadian and American wheat.

Mr. Wilkinson testified further as follows:

The better grade of wheat has to bring the lower price at the other side of the line, because their market is the export market of Great Britain; our wheat not being quite as good, being worth less intrinsically, from 3 to 4 cents per bushel, will sell from 5 to 15 cents more per bushel on this side of the line at practically the same market points, with practically the same facilities to get it to the markets of the country as the other, because we have built up that home market for our products. That is the reason our wheat, our northwestern wheat, is worth to us more money than it is in Liverpool.

Mr. Lyon, another intelligent witness, said:

For more than five years past the price of northern wheat at Minneapolis has averaged from 5 to 15 cents per bushel more than at Winnipeg. The price at Winnipeg, as you all know, is based upon delivery at Fort William port. From July 10, 1909, to January 28, 1911, the price of northern wheat at Minneapolis averaged 10½ cents per bushel more than at Winnipeg. The expense of shipment from Minneapolis to Duluth is approximately 1½ cents per bushel, thus making a difference of about 12 cents per bushel between the prices at Duluth and Fort William, on opposite sides of the international line at the head of Lake Superior, and with equal freights to Liverpool. Can anything show more clearly that the price of our wheat is not determined by the Liverpool market, as has been repeatedly stated by the President?

There were scores of other witnesses whose testimony sustained the statements of these two whom I have quoted; but, of course, I will not quote from all of them.

Mr. President, do we know better than the wheat farmers and the stock raisers what will be the effect of these duties upon their products? That the wheat farmers and the stock raisers of this country believe that putting their products on the free list will reduce the price is not to be disputed. Any man who heard, as I did, their testimony before the committee could have no doubt about it. No man who has read that evidence can have a doubt about it if he believes what these farmers from 20 States said. They came here, Mr. President, when this treaty was before us during the last session of Congress. They came back again during this session. They came not in dozens or in scores, they came in hundreds from, I think, twenty-odd States, some of them more than a thousand miles distant from the Capital, and a more determined, earnest, honest set of men and witnesses I have never seen offered to support any cause.

I heard them both times. If there was any fact or circumstance which could impeach the integrity of the testimony which they delivered, I did not hear it. I know of no reason why the scores and hundreds of farmers who appeared before the committee, speaking with knowledge of the actual facts with reference to the price of wheat here and in Canada, and its known effect to them upon their prices, are not to be believed. I say I heard them both times, and I am ready to confess here that my former views with regard to this matter were materially changed as the result of that testimony; and I can not believe that any Senator here who heard that testimony rose from those hearings with any reasonable doubt in his mind that the effect of putting wheat upon the free list will be to reduce the price of wheat in this country to the Canadian level, which is from 10 to 15 cents below the American level.

It is said, Mr. President, that these farmers were demanding protection for their products. They were not. They were simply demanding equal treatment for their products under whatever tariff legislation Congress might enact. They were simply demanding that their industry should not be singled out; that they should be treated with reference to the tariff as other industries were treated. They were demanding that, if their products were put upon a free-trade basis, the things which they had to buy in making that wheat, in raising those cattle, in conducting their farming operations, should also be put upon a free-trade basis.

The following extracts from the minority report on the reciprocity bill of the Finance Committee made by Senator MCCUMBER (S. Rept. 63, pt. 2) gives a view of these matters that is in conformity with the tables I have presented and with the evidence delivered in the hearings before the committee. The facts stated as to the relative prices of these products were amply demonstrated by the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before us. The report, among other things, says:

(8) For a number of years the northwestern farmers have received for their cereal products a price considerably in excess of what such products would bring for export purposes. The great markets of Minneapolis and Duluth have for several years ceased to be exporting markets for the principal kinds of wheat raised in the States tributary to those markets.

(9) It is claimed by some of the supporters of this measure that, as we still export grain from some parts of the United States, our prices are governed and fixed by the foreign prices. This is not true to-day, and has not been true for a number of years. The cost of transporting grain from Minneapolis to Liverpool, including insurance, commission, handling, etc., is about 15 cents per bushel. Allowing reasonable profit on capital and risk of business, we can export from Minneapolis to Liverpool only when the Liverpool prices are from 16 to 17 cents above the Minneapolis price.

The following are the average prices paid for No. 1 northern wheat in Minneapolis and Liverpool for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, Agricultural Department:

Years.	Minneapolis.	Liverpool.	Difference.
1908	$1.11	$1.25	$0.14
1910	1.14	1.14	.00

If, therefore, we had been dependent upon Liverpool prices for our wheat, we would have received 3 cents per bushel less for it in 1908, 8 cents per bushel less in 1909, and 17 cents per bushel less in 1910.

Senator MCCUMBER comes from the great wheat-producing State of North Dakota, and has personal knowledge of the things of which he speaks.

These facts establish beyond controversy that on account of the limited demand of the local market the price of Canadian wheat of all kinds is on the export basis, and by reason of the local demand, taking practically the whole of our production of high-grade wheat, the domestic price here is from 8 to 17 cents in excess of the export price. The fact stands for itself. No amount of theory or sophistry can overthrow it or refute it. You can not argue it away.

Why is Canadian high-grade wheat on an export basis while the high-grade wheat of this country is not? The answer is found largely in the fact that while Canada has a population of only about 8,000,000 people it produces more wheat for export than we do. It is found in the further fact that while the American wheat producer has 92,000,000 local customers for his wheat, the Canadian wheat producer has only 8,000,000 local consumers of his wheat.

Mr. President, remove the duty on wheat from Canada and let Canadian wheat come into this country, and I think there can be no question about the fact that at once the price of wheat in this country will drop to the level of the price of wheat in Canada, which is, as I have shown, from 5 to 15 cents lower.

The difference is more marked between the prices of barley in this country and in Canada than in the case of wheat. Barley has for a long while sold in this country for very much more than it sells for in Canada, running from 25 to 30 cents a bushel more. We do not export barley. Nobody claims that. To say that the duties on barley in this country are not operative is to disregard all the facts with reference to the price of barley here and elsewhere.

Mr. Bryan, for years recognized as the leader of the Democratic Party, knew the effect of taking the duty off of barley when he was in the House at the time the Wilson bill was adopted. He came from a barley-producing State, and when the bill as reported to the House provided for a reduction of duty on that product to 20 per cent, he and a few other Democrats from the barley-producing States joined with the Republicans and raised the duty in the bill as reported from 20 per cent to 25 per cent and on barley malt to 35 per cent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I did not rise to question the statement, because I do not know whether Mr. Bryan was in favor of a duty on barley or not. But I wanted to ask the Senator from North Carolina why barley is cheaper in Canada than in the United States? What is the reason?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should suppose, Mr. President—I have not examined that question—probably it is because, as respects barley, Canada is on an export basis while we are not. It produces more than it consumes, while we do not.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator believe that that is the only reason?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I believe that another reason is that when there are 92,000,000 customers for a product and there is not enough of it, it will be higher than when there are only 8,000,000 consumers of a product and there is too much of it.

Mr. REED. Then I understand the Senator to say that we can not raise enough barley in the United States, and that is the reason the price is higher? I want to ask him now if he takes the position that when the farmers of the United States can not raise enough of an article to feed the people of the United States they then ought to be compelled to pay an additional price on food products—if that is his Democratic doctrine?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have stated very explicitly that the farmers who came here asking that the duties on these things, their products, be not removed did not come asking for protection. They came simply asking that their products should be treated like the products of every other class of people in this country. I am not here advocating and supporting the duties that are upon barley or any other farm products if they are too high for revenue purposes. My belief, however, is that the duties upon farm products are, as a rule, moderate compared with those on manufactured products in this bill and in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. REED. What is the duty on barley?

Mr. SIMMONS. At present?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is 30 cents a bushel. I am not quite sure about that.

Mr. NELSON. Thirty cents a bushel.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator does not let me finish. I am not arguing, and I have stated that I am not arguing, in support of high-protective duties on farm products.

The argument I am making is the argument the farmers made when they came before the committee, that the things they sell should not be put upon the free list while the things they buy remain on the protected list—that the products of the farm and of the soil should not be put upon a free-trade basis while the products of the factory remain on the protected basis, as is provided in this bill.

That is my contention. I am not defending the duties placed upon farm products by the Payne-Aldrich bill or any other bill. I am like the Senator from Missouri—in favor of a revenue tariff. Nevertheless, I am opposed to removing all duties on farm products, while in practical effect increasing the protection on the manufactures of those products, as this bill in some instances does, as I can and shall demonstrate. The Senator claims that the duties on farm products, which I am insisting shall not be entirely removed unless the duties on those things the farmer buys are also removed, are protective duties, and that in taking this position I am advocating those duties.

Now, I wish to ask the Senator, who is supporting this bill which retains an average duty of about 20 per cent on all manufactured products included in its provisions—duties highly protective, almost prohibitive as against Canada—does the Senator, in giving his support to this bill, wish to be understood as standing for these highly protective duties? Does he wish to be understood as standing for the increases in protection which this bill gives the packers, millers, and the brewers?

Mr. STONE. It is lowered.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is nominally lowered, but by reason of the fact that the raw materials of these manufacturers and trusts are put upon the free list, the amount of protection that remains is higher and greater by something over 100 per cent than the amount in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. STONE. That is purely speculative.

Mr. REED. I do not intend to get away from the question I was asking the Senator or to let the Senator get away from it if I can help it. The Senator has stated that the price of barley is very much——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will answer the Senator, if that is what he wishes me to do. I am not advocating the present duty on barley. I think that duty too high. I would favor its reduction to a revenue basis. But that is not the question. The question I am discussing is whether these duties on farm products are operative in present conditions and whether they should be entirely removed while protective duties are retained upon the manufactured products with which this bill deals. I am contending against the wholesale removal of the duties on farm products while the duties on the finished products are retained; and I am denying the proposition of the advocates of this measure that the removal of the duty on farm products will not effect the price of farm products in this country. In taking this position, I am not advocating those duties any more than the supporters of this bill are advocating the protective duties it retains on manufactures.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator stated that the tariff on barley was about 30 per cent——

Mr. BAILEY. Thirty cents a bushel.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say that. I said 30 cents a bushel in the present law.

Mr. REED. The Senator says we can not, in this country, raise enough to supply our people. He then says that he is in favor of a tariff for revenue. I want to ask him if this tariff of 30 cents a bushel has not been practically prohibitive, and if it is not a protective tariff rather than a revenue tariff?

Mr. SIMMONS. There will be no controversy between the Senator and myself about the tariff on this particular item. I voted against the increase made in the duty on barley by the Payne-Aldrich bill. I am not justifying it any more than I suppose the Senator means, by voting for this bill, to justify the still higher duties it retains on barley malt, the manufactured article.

Mr. REED. The Senator has said that his opposition to this bill arises from the fact that we are taking the tariff off for the farmer and giving him no compensation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The argument I am now making—and the Senator must not confuse the proposition I am now discussing with some other proposition—is to show, as I have several times distinctly stated, that the President and the advocates of this bill are not correct when they assert that the duties on farm products, which it is proposed to repeal, are not operative as to the three staple products I am discussing.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator this question: If he has not stood on the platforms of his State and the platforms of this country for many years denouncing the protection measures, as applied to the farmer, as utterly inoperative and useless, and as a mere sop thrown to the farmer? Has he not done it a thousand times on a thousand platforms?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no hesitation in saying to the Senator that that was my view in times past with respect to most of the duties on farm products. But in the light of the facts that have been revealed in the investigations and voluminous hearing made by the Finance Committee, of which I am a member, of this question—on account of the fact of our diminishing exports of these products, and on account of the fact that we are now practically upon a nonexporting basis as to them, all of which facts have been undeniably established by the statistics and testimony presented to the committee at the last and present session—I am satisfied, as I have before stated, that these duties are operative as to the products that I have been discussing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you say now operative?

Mr. SIMMONS. I said operative—operative exactly as the President contends they are not operative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Operative how? As protection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Operative in the sense that there are importations which have to pay these duties.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Operates for protection to the farmer?

Mr. SIMMONS. Operates to the extent of preventing the wheat of this country sinking down to the export level of Canada.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is, operates to the protection of the producer?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just as the duties in this bill on the manufactures of these farm products, which duties the Senator from Mississippi is insisting shall not be either repealed or reduced, operate to protect the manufacturers of those products.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Never mind about the other items. But the duties upon these agricultural products, you contend, now operate as protection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; just as the duties on the manufactured products embraced in the bill operate as protection. I am insisting that you must not discriminate against the farmers of this country in favor of other interests.

If you will reduce the duty on the things the farmer buys, then I will vote for your bill. But, Mr. President, I am not willing that the duties of the present law on farm products shall be wiped out while the duties on the manufactures of those products as well as upon the manufactures the farmer buys in making his crops are retained or only immaterially reduced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I understand the contention of the Senator from North Carolina to be that he will not vote for the removal of protection in any instance unless he can get an opportunity to remove protection in all its operations.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understands me as saying that I will not vote to raise or retain protective duties on manufactured products and for free trade in farm products.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill does not raise the duties on manufactured products nor the duty on single manufactured product.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not reduce the effective protection on the manufacturer's products, but increases it by giving him free raw materials.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not raise the duties on a single manufactured product, and lowers duties on many of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there are nominal reductions, but the duties retained on manufactured products are more protective as against Canada, where cost influencing conditions are similar to those in this country, than are the duties of the Payne-Aldrich bill upon the same articles imported from Great Britain, France, or Germany, where conditions are dissimilar to ours.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from North Carolina give to the Senate a single instance in which the bill raises a duty upon the finished product?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will wait, I will show that the bill raises the protection on a number of articles. It is the protection and not the rate that is important.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator to do it because I make the assertion that the bill does not in any single instance raise the rate of duty upon a single manufactured article or upon a single finished product.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not nominally, and I have not stated that it did. What I stated is that by taking the duty off of the raw product of the packers and the millers and the brewers the duties retained, though nominally reduced, are more protective by far than the duties of the existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not trouble the Senator from North Carolina much longer. I understand his contention to be that the protection against the consumer consists in the difference between the duty on the raw material, so called, and the duty upon the finished product. Is it not a fact, and has it not been eloquently maintained by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and does not the Senator from North Carolina maintain, that the measure of protection, in so far as it maintains or fixes price, consists in the rate of duty upon the finished product; and if the rate of duty on the finished product be reduced by this bill, no matter what else happens, then the protection to the detriment of the American consumer is reduced just that far?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have asked the Senator from North Carolina the question, and I should like to have a reply to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator had better let me answer the question he has already asked before asking another.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not asking another. I ask the Senator if the measure of robbery, the measure of governmental larceny, the measure of protection against the consumer does not consist in the rate of duty on the finished product?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me illustrate. Does not the Senator understand that if there is a duty of 25 cents upon a finished product and a duty of 10 cents upon the raw material out of which that product is made, if the duty on the finished product is reduced 5 cents and the duty on the raw material is taken off altogether, the effective protection on the finished product will be greater than before?

Mr. WILLIAMS. When the Senator from North Carolina asks me that question, I will answer distinctly that the Senator from Mississippi has not an intellect so acute as to perceive that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator's intellect is acute enough.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the duty on the finished product were 25 per cent, then regardless of what the duty was on the raw material, if that duty were reduced to 15 per cent the reduction of duty in favor of the consumer would be 10 per cent, and unless some other factor entered to disturb the equation the price to the consumer would be lowered just that much. No amount of refinement and "subtraction and addition" can make anything else out of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator says the practice in all tariff bills of adding enough duty to the finished product to compensate the manufacturer for the duty on his raw material is based on an utterly false theory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In so far as the capacity or ability of the foreign producer to send his goods to the American market is concerned, yes. Take shoes and hides, for example. When you reduced the duty on hides you enabled the shoe manufacturer to reduce the duty on shoes.

Mr. SIMMONS. He did not do it, though.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not through. But you do not compel him. When you went further and reduced the duty on shoes you compelled him to reduce his price. So with this. When you reduce the duty on dressed meat, when you reduce the duty on flour, when you reduce the duty upon the other finished articles, you compel the American producer to meet the foreign producer with a lessened price.

In further answer to what the Senator from North Carolina answers to me, I will say, in forming a just tariff to the American producer, every time you put a duty upon raw materials you must just by that much increase the duty upon the finished product.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose you take off the duty on the raw material and do not take it off of the finished product, what is the effect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not necessarily anything; but when you reduce the duty on the finished product, regardless of what you have fixed upon the raw material, then you force the American producer of the finished product to lower his prices in the American market, if indeed they are not already so low that the foreigner can not compete with him. When you reduce the duty on the raw material you merely enable him to lower his price, and God alone can make him do it unless he wants to; but when you add to that a reduction on the finished product then you compel him to do that which in common fairness he ought to do, because by cheapening his cost of production you have enabled him to do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we have had an illustration of this forcing the producer of the finished product to reduce his price by taking the duty off of his raw materials and at the same time slightly but not sufficiently reducing the duty on the finished product—just as this bill does. We took the duty off of hides, as the Senator from Mississippi says. At the same time we reduced the duties on shoes, the finished product, to 15 per cent. The shoe manufacturer gave up 10 per cent on shoes and saved 15 per cent on the hides used in making them. His effective protection was not reduced but increased. Instead of forcing the Shoe Trust to reduce the price of shoes—to abate their larceny, to adopt his language—as the Senator from Mississippi says that line of action should do, it has enabled that heartless combination to increase their exaction from the wearers of shoes. Speculation and theory may be attractive, but facts are real.

The Senator is entirely correct in his general proposition that reducing the duty on the finished product below the prohibitive point will expose the domestic manufacturer to that extent to foreign competition.

The practical question we are discussing here is not whether the slight reductions made in the duties on manufactured products from Canada is going to result in additional importations from that country, thereby increasing competition, because everybody knows that Canada is not an exporter of these things; that she can not compete with our manufacturers in these products; and that the duties retained are as protective as against her, on account of similarity of conditions, in labor and material cost, as twice that amount would be against our real competitors.

That is not the practical question here at all; the practical question is, Will the manufacturer be forced by these slight reductions to reduce his price to the consumer, and if not forced to do so, where he is given his raw materials free, will he voluntarily give the consumer the benefit of his saving or put it in his pocket?

Mr. President, while this bill will help the manufacturer, there is not a line in it that promises the consumer of manufactured goods any relief from his tariff burdens.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want to correct the statement which the Senator from Mississippi makes as to my position on this question. I have never maintained, or if I have ever made such a declaration on the floor, it was made in the confusion of debate here and did not correctly represent my views—that the duty on the finished product represents the manufacturers' protection, but I have always maintained——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not state that. I said it measured the protection against the consumer—the price fixing protection. It might leave an opportunity for greater profit to the manufacturer while lowering price to the consumer.

Mr. BAILEY. What I have always contended is that the duty on the finished product regulates, so far as the tariff duty regulates it at all, the manufacturer's price of the finished product.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the home market.

Mr. BAILEY. In the home market. I can well conceive, and I have maintained it on more than one occasion, that you can increase the manufacturer's real protection while at the same time reducing his selling price. In other words, if you reduce his cost of production 30 per cent, while you reduce the duty on his finished product only 20 per cent, he has a clear net gain of 10 per cent in his protection. There are two ends at which the manufacturer may be protected. One is the producing end, the other is the selling end, and I take it you can just as effectively protect him by reducing the cost of production as you can by increasing his selling price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But with this distinction between the two things: When you increase his protection at one end of the line, to wit, the finished-product end, you increase the price to the people, and when you increase his protection just as effectively by reducing a duty at the other end of the line, to wit, the raw-material end, you do not increase the price to the people. In other words, the difference between encouraging manufactures by enabling manufacturers to produce more cheaply is one thing, and encouraging manufactures by enabling them to filch a higher artificial and legislative price out of the pockets of the people is another thing. In the former case you encourage manufactures by untaxing the consumer—that is, reducing taxation; in the latter you encourage them by taxing the consumer—that is, increasing taxes. One is statesmanship; the other is legislative larceny.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, my mind can not quite comprehend the difference in political morality between allowing the manufacturer under one duty to filch a profit of 40 per cent, and another duty that allows him to filch a profit of 30 per cent. A duty is undoubtedly a protection, no matter what purpose you levy it for, and the immorality of the transaction, so far as it strikes my mind, consists wholly in levying the duty for the purpose of enabling one man to charge more against another man who must buy his goods.

But so long as the real purpose of a tariff is to raise money to support the Government I do not conceive that there is any immorality in the transaction. There is a regrettable incident connected with it. For instance, if we collected taxes in corn I would dislike very much to see the taxgatherer go to a farmer's crib and open it and spill some of the corn on the ground while he was taking this toll which the State demanded; but I would not be willing to keep the tax collector from the farmer's crib, notwithstanding the unavoidable incident that in taking a part of the farmer's corn to contribute toward the support of the Government the result was to spill some of the corn on the ground. I would regret it, but I would not exempt him from taxation because I could not avoid that. So I regret the incidental protection which is afforded by a purely revenue duty, but that can never be avoided, and in my judgment a sound Democracy requires that this unavoidable incident shall be distributed to all classes, all sections, and all industries as equally as the wisdom of man makes it possible.

If the Senator will permit me, while I am on my feet, I wish to say that I can conceive many taxes which I would oppose and yet the partial repeal of which I would equally oppose. For instance, if there were a per capita tax on all the people of these United States, I would be opposed to it. I believe it would be unnecessary and unjust. But if it were proposed to repeal that per capita tax on all men except red-headed men, I would vote no, because it would be obviously and infamously unjust to make that kind of a discrimination. Or, to state it in another way——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be because you select a purely artificial distinction.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But suppose you exempt men who were receiving less than so much a month or so much a year?

Mr. BAILEY. But you have made a purely artificial distinction here. You have exempted everybody but the farmers from the repeal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; not from the repeal.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, let me finish. I want to go one step further and say that if we had a per capita tax, and if under the Constitution it could be repealed as to some States and continued as to others, as much as I would be opposed to it, I would resist the repeal of that tax as it applied to the States of Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and still leave it in effect against the people of Texas. I maintain that though a tax is unjust, as long as my people must pay it so likewise all other people must pay it. And the Senator from Mississippi would not disagree with me about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; because that would be purely a sectional discrimination.

Mr. BAILEY. If I might be permitted to venture a suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina, as I understand his argument—and it is mine—we favor a revenue tax, but we demand that it shall be applied to all men, to all sections, to all classes, and to all industries alike, and we denounce a proposition to repeal it upon all which the farmer sells and only reduce it on all of the implements with which the farmer makes his products.

For instance, Mr. President, the Government of the United States collects more revenue on wheat than it collects on all farm implements combined from Canada. It collects over $38,000 in duty on wheat and collects less than half as much as that on all the implements that go to the farmer's place from Canada. Yet we repeal the duty on wheat wholly and we only reduce the duty on all these agricultural implements.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I should like to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to reply to just one other thing about discrimination.

Mr. SIMMONS. I must ask Senators not to altogether take me off my feet. I want——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not trying to do that, I trust, Mr. President.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has said that we made a discrimination in this bill. We make no discrimination. We are meeting a condition which is presented to us. The question that I want to put to him and to the Senator from North Carolina and to men who seem to agree with him—and there are very few of them on this side of the Chamber——

Mr. SIMMONS. There are plenty of them in the country, though.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this: If we divide into two camps, one of which makes a fetish of "free raw material" and the other of which makes a fetish of "antifree raw material," we can never come to a vote, while we are called upon to reduce any particular protective duty, without finding part of us voting with the Republicans, on the ground that until we can reduce it as that part would wish they will not reduce it upon the given article; and thus a part of us are left always voting with the Republicans for protection.

Here, for example, is a protective duty on barley and a protective duty on flax. The idea that the difference between two duties is the measure of Democratic opposition is a mistake, for this reason, because the Democratic opposition to protectionalism is merely that it robs the consumer, and if you reduce the duty on the finished product you are benefiting the consumer just that far——

Mr. BAILEY. And the duty on both barley and flax is as low as a Democratic House has found itself able to reduce the duty on woolen manufactures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing. It is not the rate of a duty that constitutes its character as protectionism. It is the effect of the duty. A 10 per cent duty upon one article may be prohibitive, while a 50 per cent duty upon another might not be, but might admit importation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true; and yet no man living will contend that the 10 per cent duty is as objectionable as one of 50 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not, even if prohibitive?

Mr. BAILEY. It is not, because a 50 per cent duty will increase the manufacturers' exaction against the consumer 50 per cent, while a 10 per cent duty can only add 10 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, in point of degree the Senator is right, but in kind they are liable to the same Democratic objection, because they are both prohibitive. The point, the Democratic point of a tariff for revenue only, if I understand the teaching of the fathers of the party, is the maximum revenue point, within governmental needs, whatever it may be.

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President, that is not the Democratic doctrine. The Democratic doctrine is the lowest rate below the maximum revenue-producing point that will support the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Democrats believe in increasing the revenue by decreasing the duties.

Mr. BAILEY. The Democratic doctrine is the lowest rate below the maximum tariff-producing point that will support the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the more correct statement of it. It is the maximum revenue point, provided the Government needs that amount of revenue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will please give his attention to the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought that I had the permission of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina was demanding the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not hear him demand it, or I should have given it to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi if he wants to go on.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I know how troublesome it is and how disagreeable it is to have a Senator's speech interrupted in this way, and I authorize the Senator from North Carolina, when he comes to print his speech in the RECORD or in pamphlet form, to cut out whatever I have said.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am much obliged to the Senator, but I will not do that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri, who has long been waiting patiently for that purpose?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one minute. I have had no opportunity to speak for some little time.

Mr. President, the discussion that has gone on between the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has strayed far away from the question which I was discussing. I was discussing the question, and I do not intend to be diverted from it, whether taking the duties off the farm products, as is proposed in this bill, would operate to reduce the price of farm products, and whether those duties are operative at present. But before I get back to that I want to say a word in further reply to the Senator from Mississippi on the subject of free raw materials. I want to say to that Senator that I am not as favorably inclined as he seems to be to enlarging the free list.

Mr. President, with one-half of the product imported into this country already upon the free list it is now proposed to enormously add to that list by putting upon it practically all the natural products of the country. That is not in keeping with Democratic doctrine; that is not in conformity with that great Democratic measure known as the Walker tariff, which has been the model Democratic tariff in this country for more than half a century. The free list in the Walker tariff does not comprise much over half a page of printed matter. The Democratic theory, as interpreted and applied by the great Democrats of that day, was that all the products of the country should bear equally the burdens of taxation and should participate equally in the incidental benefits of our tariff system. If that doctrine be carried out, tariff taxes would not bear heavily on any part of the people, nor would it furnish another part, and a very small part, the opportunity to rob and oppress the millions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would not insist upon this interruption, but I started this controversy by asking a couple of questions, and I was not through.

Mr. SIMMONS. Which I thought I answered half a dozen times, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. REED. They were preliminary to the question I now desire to ask.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator state whether the question he is going to ask is pertinent to the subject I am discussing? I do not wish to have the thread of my argument broken.

Mr. REED. It is exactly pertinent, if I understand the theory of the Senator, and it is not to interrupt that I rise, but I want to get such elucidation of this matter as the Senator, with his great ability, can give. I understand the Senator's position now to be that the effect of the reciprocity bill will be to reduce the price of wheat, barley, and certain other farm products to the farmer, but that it will not reduce the price to that extent to the consumer; in other words, in taking the duty off of the raw material, the benefit will never reach the consumer, because a trust of some kind, completely dominating our market, will simply absorb that benefit.

I understand that to be his position, and to be his position especially with reference to wheat. I want to ask the Senator this question: If he means to say to this Senate and to the country that there is a Milling Trust? I call his attention to the fact that, as shown by the Bureau of Statistics, there were in 1905—the last year as to which I am able to get statistics—10,051 separate and distinct milling institutions in the United States; that they ran from 72 in number in New Hampshire to as high as 1,195 in the State of Pennsylvania, and that the State of North Carolina, which is so ably represented by the Senator, had 234.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. REED. To conclude my statement, so that the Senator can answer it all at once—and I will not again interrupt him further, unless, if his answer does not suit me, I will reply——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can interrupt me as much as he pleases.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to do so, because the Senator wants to finish his speech, and it is proper he should be allowed to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to cut off any interruption.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator if he means to say that these 10,051 separate milling institutions in this country, all having access to the market, and consequently having the benefit of this cheap wheat when it comes, are so united and bound together that that benefit will not reach the consumers of the United States?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not able to say categorically that the flour millers are in a trust. I could not prove it. But by means entirely effective for the purpose they seem able to control the price of flour. Like many other industries, not outwardly controlled by a central trust, they seem by a mutual understanding to have succeeded pretty well in establishing and maintaining the prices of their products and avoiding very troublesome competition between themselves.

Mr. President, in the South there are hundreds of cottonseed-oil mills. I do not suppose technically they constitute a trust, yet in some mysterious way they fix the price of the seed they buy and of their several products. There is practically no competition. The effect on the consumer is about the same as if they were in a trust. Their number seems to have but little to do with it. There are 27,000 lumber mills in this country as against 10,000 flour mills according to the Senator, yet there are those who never tire in denouncing them as a part of a gigantic trust.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator keeps talking combinations, and he has talked about combinations in other things, but I am limiting my question to the flour business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have answered the question of the Senator and given him all of my knowledge about it and all of my facts. I do not say that about the flour mills, but I do say if they have no arrangement by which they regulate the price of flour, it is very strange that the price of flour is practically the same everywhere in the United States; and I want to say further if they have no such arrangement they would seem to be an exception to the rule which seems to generally obtain in our industrial system.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if he knows of a single particle of evidence, outside of the mere fact that the prices are about the same, of any combination between the flour mills of his own State, over 200 of them, and the other flour mills of the country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have answered that fully. I have given the Senate the benefit of all the information I have about it, as well as the benefit of my deductions. It is not necessary to go on repeating question and answer.

Mr. President, I want to remind the Senate of what I was discussing before I was interrupted, because I want to get back to that. I was discussing the question, in answer to the President's contention in all of his recent speeches, whether the duties on farm products were operative, and, if operative, whether their removal would not in some way injuriously affect the farmer? I take it that nobody will contend that the duty on cattle is not operative.

Last year we imported from Mexico 188,000 head of cattle, and the duty we collected on Mexican cattle amounted to about $600,000. We only import about 5,000 head from Canada, but Canada exported 159,000 head of cattle to Great Britain. Why did Canada not export those 159,000 head of cattle to the United States? We are right at her door. Why did she send them across the sea? Because we have a duty against Canadian cattle and Great Britain has no duty against them. They went there because they could go free. They do not come here to be sold in competition with our native cattle, because they would have to pay a duty to get in our markets. It will not do, therefore, to say that the duty against Canadian cattle has not been operative. Remove the duty upon cattle from Canada and the bulk of the 160,000 now sent to Great Britain will be sent here, which, added to the 188,000 from Mexico, will make our importations of cattle about 400,000 head a year.

The fact that the present duty on cattle excludes so largely importations from Canada, while not having the same effect against Mexico, illustrates and confirms the contention I shall make later (when I come to discuss the reductions in duties on manufactures which this bill makes) that on account of the similarity of conditions here and there a small duty against Canada is more protective than a much larger duty against most other countries.

It must therefore be admitted that the duties on these staple products of the farm are operative under present conditions, and that their entire removal will reduce the price which the farmer now receives.

Does this bill, as I have alleged it does, while putting wheat, barley, and live stock on the free list, increase the protection of the manufactures of those products?

It reduces the duty on meat from 1½ to 1¼ cents per pound. It reduces the duty on flour from $1 to 50 cents per barrel, but it gives the packer and the miller their raw materials free.

Now, let us see if the effect of this does not actually increase instead of reduce the net protection of the manufactures of these products.

I have a table here furnished me, as a member of the Finance Committee, by an expert from the Treasury Department assigned by order of this committee to assist minority Members in getting up statistics with respect to the tariff legislation now before us. This table I submit will show that as a result of the removal of the duty on these raw materials this agreement greatly increases the protection offered by the Payne-Aldrich Act on meats and flour.

Effect of proposed reciprocity upon the protection to certain industries.

	Duty.
	Present.	Reciprocity.
Beef cattle:
Alive, valued at $50	$13.75
Dressed, 700 pounds	10.50	$8.75
Protection to packer	[1] 3.25	8.75
Swine:
Alive	1.50
Dressed, 200 pounds	3.00	2.50
Protection to packer	1.50	2.50
Sheep:
Alive	1.50
Dressed, 150 pounds	2.25	1.87½
Protection to packer	.75	1.87½
Wheat:
4.53 bushels (amount needed to make 1 barrel flour)	1.13
Flour, 1 barrel	$1.18	$0.50
Millstuff, 55 pounds	.10	.07
	1.28	.57
Protection to miller	.15	.57

[1] Against the packer.

According to this table, upon live stock, steers, valued at $50, there is a duty under the present law of $13.75. When that steer is dressed, he will dress 700 pounds, and there is under the present law a duty on that dressed meat of $10.50. So it is seen that at present the duty on the live stock is $3.75 against the packer instead of in favor of him.

Now, take the reciprocity agreement. On that steer there is no protection. On the 700 pounds of meat there the protection is $8.75. So that while the protection under the Payne-Aldrich bill is $3.75 against the meat packer, under this bill the protection is $8.75 plus $3.75 in favor of the meat packer.

Take swine. Take a hog, undressed, live, the duty is $1.50. If it dresses 200 pounds, the duty on the meat is $3. So that under the Payne-Aldrich bill the packer's net protection on a hog dressing 200 pounds is $1.50. Under the reciprocity treaty there is no duty on the hog, but a duty of $2.50 on the meat it dresses. So that under this treaty the net protection of the meat packer on a 200-pound hog is $1 more than under the Payne-Aldrich bill.

On the meat of a sheep which will dress 150 pounds the packer gets under this treaty $1.12½ more protection than he receives under the Payne-Aldrich bill.

On the finished product of wheat required to make a barrel of flour the miller will get 42 cents more protection under this agreement than under the Payne-Aldrich Act.

The packers, it is true, do not sell all the meat the people consume. The farmer slaughters some and the local butcher slaughters some, but the packers fix the price of their meats, as they do the price of that of all others.

Of course, Mr. President, if this treaty becomes a law the packer and the miller will get their raw materials cheaper, but the consumer will not get the finished product cheaper except through the grace of the trusts.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to ask the Senator—if this is not too serious a question to inject any humor into—to suggest whether we shall get anything from the generosity of the trusts?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a little humorous, I admit, to suggest even the remote possibility of the trusts voluntarily sharing their profits with anyone.

Unless our experience with trusts is overturned in this instance it can not be doubted that they will put the savings in their own pockets and snap their fingers at the consumer.

This will be the result unless the Democratic contention, that the price of trust and tariff protected products is fixed without reference to the cost of production, but as high as the tariff will allow and as high as the people will stand, is false, and I do not think it is false.

I want to call attention at this very point to a statement of Mr. Herman Ridder before the Finance Committee.

Mr. Ridder is president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, which everybody knows is the main power behind this treaty, is pushing it in season and out of season in order that the great newspaper publishers might get their print paper a little cheaper. He said, in substance: You can not reduce the price of the trust product by removing the tariff on the raw material without at the same time removing it from the finished product.

He illustrates with pulp and paper. Newspapers, he said, are at the mercy of the Paper Trust, and he declared you could not reduce the price of paper by removing the duty on pulp, out of which it was made, unless you remove the duty from the finished product—paper—itself, and he demanded that in the interest of the newspapers the tariff should come off of both paper and pulp.

The same is true of cattle and beef, of swine and pork, and wheat and flour.

Paper is made of pulp; but the newspapers do not use pulp; they use paper. Their concern, therefore, is about the price of paper and not that of pulp. Beef is the product of the cow; pork is the product of the hog; flour is the product of wheat; but the people do not eat wheat or cows or hogs; they eat flour, beef, and pork. The consumer's concern, therefore, is as to the price of flour, beef, and pork, and not of wheat, cows, and hogs. The meat packers and the millers are in a trust, just as Mr. Ridder claims the paper manufacturers are in a trust.

If you can not reduce the price of paper without reducing the duty on paper as well as pulp, for the same reason you can not reduce the price of flour and meats without at the same time reducing the tariff on flour and meats as well as cattle and wheat.

For the purpose of helping the newspapers, the bill removes the duty upon both pulp and paper imported from Canada. Why, then, not take it off of flour and meat as well as from cows and wheat?

Can anyone, under these circumstances, give a reason why the duty should not be taken off of flour and meat as well as off of cows and wheat?

The only reason given for this manifest discrimination, this utter failure of the treaty to relieve the consumers of meat and flour to the same extent as consumers of paper, is the statement that Canada would not consent to take the duty off of our meat and flour when imported into that country, and that, as the treaty was to be a reciprocal agreement, we could not afford to take it off of meat and flour imported into this country from Canada.

The answer to that explanation is twofold. First, it is not necessary that Canada should take the duty off of meat and flour. Nobody is demanding that she should. The demand is not that this duty be removed in the interest of Canada, but in the interest of the American consumers. The removal of this duty as contended would inure to the benefit of the meat and flour eaters of this country and Canada could not possibly complain of such a change on our part of the agreement, because it would be a change in her favor without requiring any concessions on her part.

The second answer is that the treaty is not reciprocal in all respects; it was not intended to be so; it is not reciprocal as to the duties on pulp and paper.

Under this treaty pulp and paper will be admitted into the United States free, but no American pulp and paper will be admitted into Canada until every Province of the Dominion removes its restrictions and prohibitions, and that every sane man knows will never happen.

It is not reciprocal as to the duty on lumber. It provides for a duty on Canadian lumber of about $1 per 1,000 feet, and it exacts a duty of about $4.50 per 1,000 feet on our lumber imported into Canada. Nor is it reciprocal as to many other items.

I am not unmindful of the argument that to change this treaty might bring it in conflict with the favored-nation clause of our commercial compacts. In the view I take of this matter I do not think that question is involved, or, at least, not seriously involved.

We are not considering a treaty, although for convenience this arrangement is frequently spoken of as such. The President has made no treaty, nor has he made any contract with Canada. He has no right to make an agreement with a foreign nation affecting the tariff except by specific authority of Congress, and Congress has given him no authority to make such a contract.

All that the President and his Secretary of State have done in the premises was to find out from Canada what she would do provided we would do certain things in which she is interested. No contract has yet been made. The Congress of the United States and the Dominion Parliament alone have the power to make a contract of this kind, and that is what they are now trying to do.

The memoranda of the understanding transmitted to us by the President are the basis upon which these representative bodies of the two countries are now trying to get together. What we do here and what is done in the Dominion Parliament and not this understanding will constitute the contract, if any is made.

Canada has indicated to us that she will do certain things if we will do certain things, and we have indicated the same thing to her. If we pass this bill we will simply say to Canada, "Here are the concessions we will make to you if you will make the concessions to us we understand you are willing to make." When both have acted there will be a contract and not before. Whether that contract shall in any way contravene the rights of other nations having treaties with us depends upon what these two representative bodies make it and not upon the understanding which has furnished the tentative, so to speak, basis for mutual legislation. Whether the equivalents fixed in the agreement, as it may eventually be made, are equal is a matter between the contracting nations alone.

While suggestions have been made here that to change the memoranda of the understanding may violate the favored-nation clause, what has been said, except in the case of two or three Senators, has seemed to me to be rather in the nature of an expression of apprehension than of firm conviction.

For the purpose of benefiting the newspapers, with the approval and sanction of the President, the bill before us amends and changes the paper-and-pulp clause of the memoranda of the understanding made by the administration with Canada, but the newspapers and the President now tell us that we must not amend the meat-and-flour clause of the understanding to accomplish the same thing for the consumers of these foodstuffs, although such an amendment would be pleasing to Canada.

Now, Mr. President, that the meat and bread eaters of this country may get the same treatment through this legislation that the newspapers demand, I have introduced an amendment to the bill putting meat and flour on the free list, as well as live stock and wheat.

Who is opposing this amendment?

Mainly, the newspapers, who, while filling their columns with demands for cheaper necessaries for the masses and denouncing the greed of the trusts, are unwilling that this bill shall be amended so as to give the bread and meat eaters the same relief from the extortions of the Beef and Flour Trusts that it as amended gives them from that of the Paper Trust.

Mr. President, this bill makes some slight reductions in the duties on manufactures other than farm and forest products, but an analysis of these reductions will show that they will offer no relief to the general consumer from tariff burdens or compensation to the farmer for putting his product on the free list.

There are two all-sufficient reasons why these reductions will afford no relief to the consumer or compensation to the farmer.

First. Conditions which affect the cost of production of manufactured products being but slightly different in the two countries, a small duty against Canada will be as effective for protection as a very large duty against those European countries where the cost of production as a result of the difference in labor and standard of living may be materially less than here. While the agreement makes reductions on many manufactured articles coming from Canada, in practically every instance the duties retained are just as protective against Canada as the duties fixed in the Payne-Aldrich Act are upon like articles imported into the United States from other countries of the world.

Second. Canada does not make to any considerable extent the manufactured articles upon which the duties are reduced, and we do not and will not buy them from her. Canada sells us agricultural products, but she does not to any considerable extent sell manufactured products. She is an agricultural country and not a manufacturing country. Her exports are largely agricultural, not manufactured, products.

The following table of manufactured articles of common consumption on which the duties are slightly reduced will confirm my statement that we buy as good as none of these things from Canada, and that the duties retained on them are as against Canada, where labor conditions are similar to those here, more protective than the duties of the Payne-Aldrich bill against our European competitors, where labor and living conditions are so largely dissimilar.

Duty on articles that farmers might buy.

Articles.	Value imports year 1910.	Present duty.	Reciprocal duty.
		Per cent.	Per cent.
Wagons	None.	35	22½
Portable engines	None.	30	20
Basins, etc	None.	35	32½
Antiseptical surgical dressing	None.	25	17½
Motor vehicles	None.	45	30
Plows	$74,618	23	15
Hay loaders	10,000	45	15
Cutlery	1,035	40	27½
Clocks and watches	1,092	40	27½
Automobiles	69,707	45	30
Musical instruments, etc	32,731	40	30

Average duty on the above under present law is 37 per cent and under proposed reciprocity is 24.7½ per cent; a duty highly protective as against Canada where conditions are similar to ours.

The rates on the other articles of manufacture embraced in the schedules show about the same difference.

If Mr. Taft is right in saying that protection is not needed where labor conditions are practically the same, then it is clear that the 24 per cent duty on these articles is just 24 per cent more protection than the American producer of these articles is entitled to.

Where there is a real reduction there are not and will not be any importations; and where there would be importations, instead of a real reduction there is an increase in protection.

It is believed that this statement is substantially true as to every probable importation of manufactures from Canada except as to lumber and as to pulp and paper. Consumers of lumber near the border will get the benefit and consumers of paper will get some benefit, but they are practically the only consumers who will be benefited by these proposed slight reductions on manufactures from Canada.

Concluding my analysis of the concessions made by us to Canada in this so-called reciprocal trade, I repeat, the farmer will be the chief loser, and there is no effective provision in the bill to compensate him in any measure for this loss; the general consumer will get nothing and the benefits of the trade will go to the railroads, the newspapers, the meat packers, the brewers, and the flour millers, and a few other tariff-protected trusts, none of whom will share their benefactions with the people.

But this is only half of this so-called reciprocal trade. The other half is the concessions Canada makes to us.

Who will pay the price of Canada's concessions, and who will get the benefits?

Canada has nothing to sell us except agricultural and forest products; on the other hand, she does not want our farm products. She does not want them because she has enough of her own. Although she has a little over 8,000,000 of people, she makes more wheat to sell than we do, and she is probably the finest grazing country on the continent. What Canada wants is free entrance into our markets for her natural products, and the concessions which she makes to us on manufactures is to secure this valuable privilege.

It is clear, therefore, that the farmer and the landowner will pay the price of the concessions Canada makes to us, as we have seen he will pay the price of our concessions to Canada.

But who will get the benefit of these concessions? Will they inure to the American manufacturer as a whole? No. Who, then, will they go to?

I answer you: To the Steel Trust, the Harvester Trust, the Automobile Trust, and the Coal Trust.

It is said that southern cottonseed oil will be benefited by the reduction made on that product. Not so. The duty which Canada levies on this product is a pure revenue duty and she has taken it off to relieve her people. The southern producers of this product have a monopoly in it. Canada must buy it from them or not buy it at all, and must pay the price they charge. They will get the same price and sell Canada practically the same amount whether there is a duty on it or not.

The total concessions made by Canada in favor of our manufactures is only a little over $1,000,000. Of this amount the Harvester Trust will get about $196,000; the Automobile Trust will get about $100,000; the Coal Trust will get about $450,000, and the Steel Trust will get a share. There will be but little left.

The farmers and the landowners, as I have shown, are the burden bearers of both concessions. This was so patent that the House of Representatives, after passing this bill, in recognition of these facts and as far as might be to remedy the wrong done the farmer, passed the so-called farmers' free-list bill.

That this reciprocity bill was regarded as unjust and unfair to the farmer is shown by the report of the Committee on Ways and Means on that bill. Chairman UNDERWOOD, speaking for the Democrats, said in that report:

> In fact, action on the Canadian agreement involves the necessity of further and immediate action in removing a number of duties on imports from other countries, in order that justice may be done to the great army of our agricultural producers, who in the Canadian agreement are to have all the alleged protection removed from their products without a corresponding or reciprocal removal of the protective duties most burdensome on the commodities they must purchase as necessary to sustain their lives and industries. As a beginning in the correction of this injustice, against which our farmers properly protest, the bill (H. R. 4413) herewith reported has been framed.

This report admits what I have contended as to the effect on the farmer and that it was proposed and passed by the House of Representatives by way of compensation for the injury incident to putting his products on the free list unless the things he had to buy were also put on the free list.

Sir, that was the general understanding when that farmers' free-list bill was framed and introduced in the House. This report of the chairman of the committee expresses with accuracy the sentiment that then existed throughout the country, the belief that was entertained by the farmers and the people as to the purpose of that bill. The country was even led into the belief that there was some sort of an understanding that the President would sign that bill. There was no statement that any actual understanding existed, it is true, but it was in the atmosphere and it was widely believed.

The Senator from Texas now offers such parts of this farmers' free-list bill as are not covered by the amendment I have offered, as a separate and independent section to this bill, so that the balm may be applied at the same time the wound is inflicted.

If the amendment I have offered is adopted, the consumer, in whose interest the demand for a tariff revision is made, will get the benefit of what the farmer loses in putting his products on the free list, and if the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is adopted the farmer will, in a measure, be compensated for his losses.

Who are the objectors to this amendment? Chiefly the newspapers and the President. The newspapers, because they think it will jeopardize their bill—because this is their bill—and because they think it will be exposed to a presidential veto. The President, because, being a protectionist, he does not believe in putting manufactured products upon the free list.

The newspapers say they are in the hands of a trust, and they demand immediate relief, even though they get it by inflicting injury upon others. They are not willing to wait until there is an opportunity to get what they want without injuring others—they demand immediate relief for themselves.

Why should the newspapers have what they want, and what I think they are entitled to in the main, at any cost, while the farmer and the general consumer must wait a more convenient season? If the farmer is wronged by this bill, why should he have to wait for compensatory legislation? Why should the wearer of woolen clothes have to wait?

I have no objection to the newspapers and magazines having free paper, but they should not insist upon getting it by riding roughshod over the interests and rights of everybody else.

There is nothing in the financial condition of the newspapers to justify them in this demand for preferential consideration and treatment over other consumers. The great metropolitan newspapers which are pressing this matter are not suffering. It is said the profits of some of them in proportion to the capital invested are equal to those of the trusts. Mr. Ridder, president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, when asked about this matter in the hearings, admitted that he was making on a circulation of 80,000 a net profit of $250,000.

We must not, we are told, amend this reciprocity measure, because if we do we will endanger it—the President may veto it. We are told it is a step in the right direction, though a short step, and that the urgency for its passage is so great we must run no risk.

If this position is sound from a Democratic standpoint, then why not apply it to the wool bill? Why not first inquire of the President how much reduction he will stand on woolen clothes? Why not apply it to the farmers' free-list bill? Why not inquire of the President how much he will concede to the farmer in compensation for what this bill takes from him? Why not apply it to all the Democratic tariff measures, and conform them to the wishes of the President? That is what is proposed in connection with this bill. Will any Democrat be willing to agree to that with respect to these other measures?

If the Democrats will vote for these amendments to this bill we can get enough votes to pass them and remove many of the objections to this measure, objections that practically every one of them will admit, and make it of some benefit to the consumer as well as fairly just to the farmer.

I see no reason why the "O. K." of the President to what we do with respect to this bill is more imperative than his "O. K." with respect to other tariff measures that are before us or that may come before us this session.

I regret exceedingly to differ with a majority of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber in this, or any other matter. It would be more agreeable to me if I could, without violation of my convictions as to what is right and wise, agree with them in this and all measures, but much as I would wish to do so, I can not agree with them that this trade agreement in its present shape, whether considered from the standpoint of political or public advantage, is either just or wise.

It is a revision of the tariff, as I see it, in the interest, not of the victims, but of the beneficiaries of protection. It removes the tariff on unmonopolized products and retains—in some instances even increases—the tariff on monopolized products. There is no tariff for revenue in it. It is half free trade and half protection—free trade in the raw materials of the soil and protection for the finished products of the factories. It is not the kind of revision the people want, and it is not the kind they voted for at the late election.

It may be to our political advantage to pass this bill, but I do not believe it. But if I thought it was to our political advantage to pass it, I am so thoroughly convinced it would be unjust to the millions of my countrymen engaged in agricultural pursuits I can not get the consent of my mind to support it.

Mr. President, an effort has been made here and elsewhere to create the impression that I am opposed to this pact because it removes the duty from rough lumber.

I deny this. I have been and I am opposed to putting lumber on the free list unless there is a general reduction of duties, or unless the machinery used in its manufacture and which adds largely to the cost of production is also put upon the free list or materially reduced. Not only I, but my colleague, and every Democratic Representative from my State, except one, voted against putting lumber on the free list in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

But it is not on account of the still further reduction in the duty on lumber that I am fighting this bill. I am fighting it because of its discrimination against the farmer.

While my main fight against this bill is on account of the way it treats the agricultural interests of the country, I do not overlook its injustice to the lumbermen and to the owners of our timber and pulp forests. The lumber industry is the largest single industry of the State, and, of course, I am interested in its prosperity; but I am under no different or greater obligation to it than I am to any and every other industry of the State.

It is said to be a treaty for reciprocity, and yet it admits Canadian paper and pulp into this country free of duty, while it is so arranged that not one pound of American-made paper can enter Canada without paying a high protective duty. It reduces the duty on dressed lumber imported into this country from Canada to an average of $1 per thousand, while lumber imported from this country into Canada is required to pay a duty of $4.50 per thousand.

Mr. President, there has been a duty on lumber, with the exception of two years, every day and every year since 1817. The present duty of 7 per cent on lumber is the lowest that has ever been imposed. It is about one-third of the duty imposed on it under the famous low-tariff bill known as the Walker tariff, which ever since has been referred to as a model Democratic measure.

I have been advised from the Treasury Department that this duty of 7 per cent is bringing in more revenue to the Treasury than any of the duties equally as low in the whole Payne-Aldrich bill. Therefore it is the best revenue-producing duty in the Payne-Aldrich bill, and therefore it meets in a high degree the Democratic requirement that the tariff be levied so as to produce the largest amount of revenue. It is nearly a 50 per cent reduction of the former duty. It has not checked importations. It has not created a wall over which our competitors can not break. It has provided a duty that subserves the purposes of revenue to an exceptional degree.

But it is said that lumber is a necessary of life; that men must have houses to live in, and that lumber is the chief material out of which they are built. Grant it. Though, as a matter of fact, only a small part of the lumber cut in this country is used for building houses, and not one-tenth of the lumber imported is used for houses. It is used for other purposes.

So are clothes a necessary of life. Men can live outdoors. They are not absolutely compelled to live in houses, but in this country men can not live without clothes. They will freeze, and, besides, the law will put them in jail if they do not clothe their bodies.

I have voted for a duty of 7 per cent on the material out of which houses are made because it was a revenue duty and because I was pledged to my people to do it. The Democrats of the House have just, almost unanimously, voted for, and the Democrats of the Senate will, when it comes to a vote, unanimously vote for, a bill to put a duty of 42 per cent upon woolen cloths, thereby imposing a duty upon the clothes the people wear six times as high as the duty for which I voted upon the material out of which the houses in which they live are made. They impose this duty on account of the revenue it produces and which the Government needs, and yet, Mr. President, it will produce no more revenue in proportion to the amount of the duty and importations than does that on lumber.

Upon what principle can a highly revenue-producing duty of 7 per cent on lumber, the material out of which the houses in which the people live are made, be said to be a protective duty, while a 42 per cent duty on the material out of which clothes the people wear are made is only a revenue duty? Why should I be denounced as a protectionist when I vote for a small but highly revenue-producing duty on the leading product of my State and applauded as a good tariff-for-revenue Democrat when I vote for a six times higher duty on an article but little produced in my State and which is no better revenue producer?

But it is not on account of the additional reduction in the duty on lumber made by this treaty that I have opposed it and am opposing it. I have stated repeatedly, and I state now, that I stand ready to vote for this bill if it is amended by adding the farmers' free list and putting meat and flour on the free list.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THORNTON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that Zeb Vance, of his own State, with the exception of the present representation from that State, one of the very greatest of its Senators, was utterly mistaken and foolish when he made this statement:

Now, sir, here are three great classes of producers of our country—the agriculturists, the miners, and the manufacturers—and they have made this compact—or, at least, it has been made for them—that the taxes are to be levied upon the articles made by the manufacturer for their "encouragement" and "protection" against competition; and taxes have been levied upon articles that compete with the miners who dig ores of iron and coal and everything of that kind from the soil. To give it the appearance of equality and justice tariffs are also levied upon the wheat, and the corn, and the oats, and the cotton, and so forth, grown by the farmer. That, on paper, looks fair, but it so happens that it is a reality for the manufacturer and miner and it is a delusion and snare for the farmer.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SIMMONS. What was Mr. Vance talking about?

Mr. REED. About the tariff.

Mr. SIMMONS. What tariff?

Mr. REED. As I understand, he was talking of the tariff which preceded the Payne-Aldrich bill, the name of which at present escapes me—I think the Dingley bill.

The miners and manufacturers together have grown rich——

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the date of that?

Mr. REED. It is a quotation which I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. It must have been the Wilson bill.

Mr. REED. He said—

The miners and manufacturers together have grown rich and accumulated enormous wealth by this protective arrangement.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to know if he proposes to read the whole of Senator Vance's speech?

Mr. REED. No; only a few lines.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not expect the Senator would interject a whole speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina decline further to yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator may proceed.

Mr. REED. I was just reading briefly to elucidate the next remark. Senator Vance continued:

The miners and the manufacturers together have grown rich and accumulated enormous wealth by this protective arrangement. But how has it been with the farmer? He has found that there is nothing to compete with him. A duty of 25 cents a bushel is laid upon his wheat, 10 cents on his corn, etc., but it turns out, in fact and in truth, that there is no competition with him coming from abroad; there is nothing to protect him against.

I say, therefore, that when this beautiful theory of protection came into practice, while it was a reality, and a substantial reality, for the manufacturer and miner, the agricultural man finds it to be a delusion and a cheat.

The prices of all his products are fixed by the markets abroad; and why? Because he makes more than will supply the home market and the surplus which goes abroad fixes the price of what is sold in the home market.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I read that in order that the Senator might have the context.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish the Senator would tell me the date of that speech.

Mr. REED. In just a moment I think I can find the date.

Mr. SIMMONS. From whose speech is the Senator now reading?

Mr. REED. I am reading from a quotation from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD just handed me by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. SIMMONS. Whose speech is it? I insist on knowing.

Mr. REED. It is found in the speech of Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. BAILEY. Made against the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REED. Not to my knowledge. It was a speech made in the House of Representatives. There are many interruptions, and, therefore, I can not tell——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to make any comment on the speech from which that extract is read. That is understood in my State perfectly well.

The Wilson bill was passed in 1894, as I remember. That is 17 years ago. I do not think it was the Wilson bill. I do not know, but I should like to know about that before I say what I am going to say. I think that speech was made against the McKinley bill, which was up in 1890, because my recollection is that, while Senator Vance was alive when the Wilson bill was framed and passed the House of Representatives, I think Senator Vance died—I am not sure, but I think he died—just before the Wilson bill came to the Senate. That is my impression.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator that I shall have to examine it and find out. I will do that, and hand the fact, whatever it is, to the Senator. The Senator says that he is Democratic, and yet he denounces free trade in lumber.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, is the Senator going to ask me half a dozen questions in one?

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me first answer the one the Senator has just asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina decline to yield further to the Senator from Missouri? That is what the Chair wishes to know.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not yield to the Senator to ask two questions at once. I want to first answer the question asked me.

Mr. President, I want to say in reference to that speech of Senator Vance that I presume the speech was made by Senator Vance on the McKinley bill, which was passed in 1890. That was 20 years ago. Senator Vance was a statesman; Senator Vance was a progressive man.

If Senator Vance were standing here to-day and had knowledge of the facts with reference to the effect of duties upon farm products, as those facts have been given to the Finance Committee and to the Senate by the witnesses, Senator Vance would not say that his statements at that time were applicable to the conditions which exist now. The Senator reads statements made by a Senator 20 years ago with reference to the effect of duties on farm products at that time, when all know that since that time there have been most radical changes in the conditions which affect the tariff duties on farm products. Everyone knows that since that time we have become practically a nonexporting nation in wheat products; that we have ceased to be an exporting nation in meat products and livestock, and we are not an exporting nation in barley—three staple articles to which this tariff relates—and that this change, so radically affecting conditions as respects tariff duties on those articles has taken place since 1890, when that speech was made.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Hold on a minute. The Senator is very keen in his desire to make some point against me, and reads an attack on me made in a speech delivered in the other House by a partisan of one of the candidates against me. Everybody in my State knows and understands this.

Let me say to the Senator from Missouri, four years after Senator Vance made the speech, extracts from which the Senator has read, the Wilson bill was passed. That was a Democratic measure, was it not, I ask the Senator?

Mr. REED. A very poor one, when it got through the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ah, but it was a Democratic bill when it left the other House, was it not?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and the Wilson bill as it left the other House had a duty, not so high, upon every agricultural product that is mentioned in this treaty—every one of them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina now yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I then understand the Senator's position to be that while Senator Vance at the time he made this speech was opposed to every form of protection, he now holds that if Senator Vance had seen that the tariff was actually to result in protecting the farmer——

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I have said nothing of the sort.

Mr. REED. In raising his price, that he would have progressed and occupied this platform?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not said anything of the sort, and the Senator shall not put words in my mouth that I have not uttered. I was speaking with reference to Senator Vance's statement with regard to duties on farm products not being operative, an utterance made in 1890; and I was referring to changes that have taken place since that time and the question of whether those duties are operative now; and I was referring to the fact that the Democrats in Congress subsequently framed and passed a bill that put a duty upon those very farm products.

Mr. REED. Everybody knows——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. REED. Everybody knows that in the Senate a bill was forced through here that did not satisfy the Democrats, and they took the best they could get.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not speaking about the bill that passed here, but I am speaking about it as it came from the other House. It carried those duties as it came from the House.

Mr. REED. There were then, Mr. President, as there are now, men who wanted protection written into revenue measures.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator means to say that I want protection written into a revenue measure, he states what he is not authorized to state as the result of my record. Mr. President, if a vote against putting farm products on the free list is a vote in the interest of protection, a vote to retain highly protective duties on the manufactures of farm products is also a vote for protection.

I stand ready, as I have repeatedly stated, to vote with the majority of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber to put wheat and live stock on the free list if they will vote with me at the same time to put the flour and meat the millers and packers make out of these farm products on the free list, so that the consumer and not the protected manufacturer will get the benefit; but they refuse to do that and insist upon retaining these protective duties in the bill. When confronted with this inconsistency they answer that these duties are reduced. I deny that. I contend that the nominal reductions this bill makes on these articles do not decrease their effective protection; but conceding for the sake of the argument their contention. The duty on meat at present is 1½ cents. This bill, while taking the duty off of live stock, reduces that on meat to 1¼ cents. Now, suppose under this arrangement the beef packers will get the benefit of the tariff retained and the consumer will get the full benefit of the reduction of one-fourth cent. Is it not manifest that the Beef Trust will get five-sixths of the benefit of putting live stock on the free list, while the people will only get one-sixth of that benefit? That is a reduction of the tariff so that the trusts get five times as much of the benefit as the people, even if any part of the one-fourth cent reduction shall trickle down to them through the hands of the trusts, the jobber, and the retailer.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, one further question. The Senator says——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that he is Democratic.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And that he stands on Democratic platforms; and yet he says he is in favor of a tariff on lumber.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And I want to read him——

Mr. SIMMONS. And I said I voted for it.

Mr. REED. I want to read him the last Democratic platform adopted by the last Democratic national convention.

Mr. KERN. And unanimously.

Mr. REED. Adopted unanimously. It reads:

> We demand the immediate repeal of the tariff on wood pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs, and that those articles be placed upon the free list.

I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he stands on that declaration when he says that he favors a tariff on lumber?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Democratic convention which made that declaration adjourned and went home, on account of the fact that lumber is the largest single interest in my State, employing tens of thousands of men, the people of North Carolina rebelled against that declaration of the Democratic Party to such an extent as to make it manifest to the Democratic executive committee of that State that we were in danger of losing the control of the State as the result of that declaration. To meet that condition, the committee issued and circulated broadcast over North Carolina a circular which, after discussing this platform pledge, gave an assurance that no Democratic Senator or Representative from that State would vote to put lumber on the free list unless mill machinery, which enters so largely into the cost of manufacturing lumber, was also put upon the free list.

If I had not recognized the authority of the executive committee of my State to bind me in that interpretation of my duty in this regard, and if I had not assented to it, as an honorable man I ought to have said so when the campaign was on and when we were using that pledge to get the votes of the lumber people of my State. I did not do so, neither did any other representative from my State, so far as I know or ever heard, but on the contrary——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Hold on; let me finish my sentence. On the contrary, Mr. President, some of the candidates for the House of Representatives read that circular on the hustings in their campaign speeches to the people and promised to abide by it if they were elected.

Mr. REED. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. In that I was following again in the footsteps of that great Democratic leader, William J. Bryan. Mr. Bryan was a candidate for Congress in the year when the Democratic national platform pledged our party to remove the 10 per cent tax on the issues of State banks. He was elected, and was a Member of the House of Representatives when the bill was brought into that House to carry out that pledge and repeal that tax. Mr. Bryan voted against that bill, and gave as his reason for voting against it, notwithstanding the Democratic national platform pledge with regard to it, that the people of his State were against it, and he had pledged himself against it to them; and carrying out that pledge, he voted against that platform declaration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will yield this once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator will be as brief as he can, for I assure him that I am just about exhausted.

Mr. REED. I want to say this: The Senator has several times remarked that I was keen to get at him, leaving an apparent inference that I have some feeling against the Senator. That would be impossible. My relations with him have always been cordial, and I trust will always so remain. I have the highest admiration for the Senator, amounting almost to affection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I feel a little grieved at the position he takes here, and it has been in the hope of receiving some light that I have been asking these questions. Now, I understand the Senator says that in order to get the vote of the lumber interests in his State the committee assured them that they would not be disturbed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said in deference to the sentiment of the State on that question.

Mr. REED. In deference to the sentiment of the State and in order to get votes, they assured the people there would be no free lumber unless something else was done. I want to ask the Senator, as a matter of morals and as a matter of Democracy, if he thinks it is right to tax the people of all the United States on their lumber in order that even a Democratic candidate should be successful in his own home State?

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that I am in favor, as he is, of a tariff for revenue, and when a bill is made applying that principle I am perfectly willing that the industries of my State and section shall take their places with those of other sections.

I stated in the Senate when I was discussing this question at the time when the Payne-Aldrich bill was up, and also in a later speech, that this specific declaration with reference to lumber must be construed with regard to our general declaration about the reduction of tariff duties; and I contended that taking this specific declaration in connection with the general declaration of the platform, it did not mean that lumber was to be put on the free list unless other duties were reduced according to the general pledge of the platform. And I said that I would vote for free lumber if the duties on articles which compete with lumber or entered into the cost of its manufacture were reduced as promised in our platform.

I said then, and I say now, that I am not willing that the industries of my State shall be treated in any different manner, in levying tariff duties, from any other State or industries; that is unjust and discriminatory.

So far as the duty on lumber is concerned, it is a revenue duty. I claimed that at the time I voted for it. It has proved itself not only to be a revenue duty, but one of the best revenue producers in the whole Payne-Aldrich bill. I am advised, as I have said before, that it is producing more revenue than any other duty in the bill equally as low as it is.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KERN. I desire to inquire if North Carolina was not represented in the Denver convention by a distinguished body of delegates——

Mr. SIMMONS. North Carolina was well represented at the Denver convention. I have answered this thing three times here in the Senate.

Mr. KERN. The Senator has not heard my question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. KERN. I ask the Senator if North Carolina was not well represented and ably represented in the Denver convention?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not attacked the Denver convention.

Mr. KERN. I desire to know if the North Carolina delegation in the Denver convention did not unanimously vote for the adoption of that platform?

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose they did; and I have not said anything to the contrary. There was a minority; but it is well understood that in such matters the minority often subordinate their views.

Mr. KERN. I want to know whether or not that platform was adopted by the unanimous vote of the delegates present?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think everything was unanimous there.

Mr. KERN. And then I should like to know the name of that distinguished North Carolinian, which I did not catch, who took it upon himself to repudiate the national platform in order to get the vote of the lumber barons of North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator wishes to know the name of the chairman of the State executive committee which issued the circular I have referred to, I will, with pleasure, give it to him.

Mr. KERN. I only inquired his name. I did not get the gentleman's name.

Mr. SIMMONS. The name of the chairman is Mr. Eller. He was then, and is now, chairman of the Democratic executive committee in my State, and a very excellent gentleman.

Mr. KERN. As I campaigned to some extent in different parts of North Carolina, I had not heard of the incident, and I was curious to know about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. By permission of the Senate, I insert here an extract from the circular with reference to lumber that has been the subject of the colloquy with the Senators from Indiana and Missouri:

DIFFERENCE IN POSITION OF THE TWO PARTIES.

The chief difference which lumbermen may expect from the two parties on this question is that the Republicans would put lumber on the free list, as demanded by its President, but that the lumbermen could expect little relief at the hands of the Republicans from the exactions of the trusts of the country, which go to make the manufacture of lumber so expensive, while they may rest assured that the Democrats would not put lumber on the free list, it being a southern product, unless there should be coupled with it the placing upon the free list of all articles entering into competition with trust-controlled articles, as their platform demands, and which would tend to largely cheapen the expenses of the manufacture of lumber.

This agreement should appeal with great force to the producers of lumber, for there is no other line of manufacture in the country more heavily taxed by the trusts. They are extensive users of steel rails, which the head of the Steel Trust testified could be made at a profit at $15 per ton, and for which they have paid during the last three years from $30 to $40 per ton. And thus it is with practically all the materials which go into the manufacture of lumber, including the increased cost of labor, which the increase of 49 per cent in living expenses by reason of unreasonable protection has made necessary. The machinery and equipment which they have for the manufacture of lumber can not be considered as a permanent investment, but by reason of the hard usage to which it is subjected has to be frequently replaced with new equipment and frequent repair; and every lumberman knows from hard experience how the cost of all such materials which go into the manufacture has, in some instances, actually doubled in the last few years under the combined robbery of protection and trusts.

The above extract from the circular under discussion is not a repudiation of the Democratic platform, but is the committee's interpretation of it.

Mr. President, I am bitterly opposed to the so-called Payne-Aldrich bill. In the committee and in the Senate I fought it with all my strength.

It is an iniquitous measure.

There are between three and four thousand items in that bill. Of this number I voted the same as did the leader of the majority at that time, Senator Aldrich, for 14 of them. I voted differently from him on all other amendments, and then voted against the bill as a whole.

I voted as he did, and as all the Democrats did, for the income-tax amendment.

I voted as he did, and as many Democrats did, for the customs-court provision.

I voted as he did, and as all the Democrats except four did, for the provision with regard to the Philippine sugar tariff.

I voted as he did, and as all the Democrats did, against recommitting Schedule K to the committee with the instruction to report a schedule with the duties on wool in the Dingley bill unchanged.

I voted as he did, and as all the Democrats except 2 did, against a tax of 10 cents a pound on tea.

I voted as he did, and as 10 Democrats did, for a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on iron ore, the raw product of the Steel Trust, a product which only the iron and steel manufacturers buy and use.

I voted as he did, and as about half of the Democrats did, for an ad valorem tax of between 12 and 15 per cent on coal. We export six times as much coal as we import.

I voted as he did on the five votes on the lumber schedule, resulting in the present duty on lumber. Upon these five votes the Democrats were somewhat equally divided.

I voted as he did for a duty on quebracho, a tanning product not produced in this country but controlled by a foreign trust. A purely revenue duty.

It will be seen that I was opposed then, as I am opposed now, to putting the raw materials of the trusts and manufacturers on the free list while the products they sell the people were protected by duties which practically gave them a monopoly of the American market.

I have no sympathy with the demand for free raw materials for the tariff-protected manufacturers and trusts. Half of the products that come into this country to-day are on the free list; a very small fraction of them, only about one-fifth, are things that the people buy and consume, the balance are the raw materials of the manufacturers and trusts. Putting them on the free list has not reduced the cost of the finished products to the consumers. It has simply increased the protection of the manufacturer.

We have an illustration of this in what happened when we put hides on the free list and retained a duty on shoes. It gave great relief to the Shoe Trust but no relief to the wearer of shoes.

The free list of the Payne-Aldrich bill is one of the most valuable provisions to the tariff-protected trusts and manufacturers in that bill. It adds enormously to their protection, while it affords relief to the consumer on but few articles.

I am heart and soul in favor of revising—yea, repealing—the Payne-Aldrich bill. I am ready to begin on it as a whole or by schedules.

But when I am asked to begin by putting the products of the farm and the soil and the things that come out of and off of the land on the free list while the manufactures of farm products and the products which the farmer and landowner buy remain highly protected, I must confess I am invited to engage in a kind of revision for which I have no stomach.

When I am asked to help in increasing the protection on the products of the two great trusts which are largely responsible for forcing the consuming millions to pay 65 per cent more for the meat and bread they eat than the farmer receives for the products out of which these necessaries are made; when I am asked to put the farmer's products on the free list in order to purchase a freer entrance into Canadian markets for the products of the Steel Trust, the Harvester Trust, the Automobile Trust, and the coal barons and thereby increase their already enormous profits; when I am asked to support a measure which I firmly believe will give the farmer no relief, but which will greatly add to his burdens, while increasing the profits and strengthening the hold of these great trusts upon the people; when I am asked by legislation to ratify a treaty agreement negotiated on the part of this Government by a rank protectionist Secretary, and which is sponsored by a President who in his pronouncement on the Payne-Aldrich bill declared it the best tariff law ever enacted; when I am asked to accept this measure without amendment, I feel compelled to both protest and withhold my support.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Kenyon	Richardson
Bailey	Cummins	Kern	Root
Bourne	Dixon	Lippitt	Shively
Brandegee	du Pont	Lodge	Simmons
Briggs	Fletcher	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Foster	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Brown	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bryan	Gore	Nelson	Stone
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Sutherland
Burton	Guggenheim	Overman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Page	Taylor
Chilton	Hitchcock	Penrose	Townsend
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Watson
Crane	Jones	Reed	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to submit an amendment and ask that it be printed, which I intend, at the proper time, to offer as an amendment to the pending bill.

This amendment is substantially the woolen schedule as it passed the House of Representatives. Indeed, it is exactly that bill with some changes in the duties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and shall take up a discussion of this measure practically where he left off.

The pending motion relates to an amendment proposed to the Canadian tariff bill designed to put foodstuffs on the free list when those foodstuffs are made from raw materials which, by this bill, are put on the free list, and we have been told upon the floor of the Senate that the bill can not, and shall not, be amended in any particular. I want first to address myself in the nature of a protest against bringing legislation into Congress in this manner and under these circumstances; that is, against the scheme of legislation being framed in detail by the Executive and then presented with the demand that it be passed without any consideration by Congress.

Now, sir, in time of peace Federal legislation must of necessity relate very largely to the material interests of the people of this Nation. With our vast area, we have diversified climatic, geographic, and productive conditions. And I submit that when it is proposed to frame legislation affecting the entire people of this Republic, every portion of this Republic has a right to be heard before that legislation is framed and comes with the prestige that is a practical command to Congress that it shall not be amended. It is impossible to imagine any general legislation, except that which is purely ethical, that does not bear more, either in burdens or grant more to one section of this country than another in the opportunities of that legislation. I insist that every section has a right to be heard when that legislation is being formed, and it is only in the equation of a Congress composed of men from every section of the country and reflecting every character of environment that a fair result to all can be obtained. But that is not all.

When legislation is proposed by a Senator or a Member of Congress it can be analyzed; it can be met in argument by other Senators and other Congressmen from the standpoint of official equality. But, sir, when legislation comes into Congress from the Executive Office there is no one upon a plane of official equality with the author who can defend a section or a class of people who may have been wronged and to whom injustice is being done.

While I do not question the constitutional power of the President to frame legislation or dictate its terms to a stenographer in his office, I do submit that great sections of this country, great classes of our people, may be wronged by that legislation, without the purpose or intent, of course, on the part of the author, and those who would defend against that wrong and injustice can not meet the author of the measure upon a level of official authority and prestige, and it puts those who are being wronged at a disadvantage.

But, sir, it goes further than that. What I am going to say now does not affect me personally as a deterrent, for to refuse to sacrifice the interest of my constituents for the sop of patronage does not embarrass me. If I had my way the occupant of every office in the United States, the territorial jurisdiction of which could be ascertained, would be elected at the hands of the electors of that territorial jurisdiction. But in place of that, we have to-day a system where thousands upon thousands are appointed to their positions by the Executive, and a measure coming from the hands of the Executive not only comes here without that equation of consideration which should be found in Congress, with its representatives from every section of the country; it not only comes to the Congress with the overpowering advantage of Executive approval with no one of official equality to challenge the correctness of his position as to that legislation, but it comes to Congress with all the potentiality and power of patronage in the hands of the Executive.

You may say that no Congressman or Senator should yield for one moment to the claims of patronage, and yet every Senator must admit that it does not conduce to the cheerfulness of senatorial service to be charged with inability to secure for one's friends their fair share of patronage, because, in defense of his constituents, a Senator finds it necessary to oppose the desire of the administration. You may say that that is something Senators should rise above, but men are human; and I submit that in legislation broad as this legislation is, legislation that may affect one section of this country advantageously and another section of this country injuriously, giving to one class an undue advantage and wronging another class, it is a wrong and injustice to either section or class that they can not be defended upon the floor of this Senate except at the cost of official recognition to the man who makes the defense. The baneful and yet potential lure of patronage should never be thrown in the scale against any section or class in proposed legislation.

We had an illustration of that a year ago when the railroad bill came into this body with the declaration that there should not be a "t" crossed or an "i" dotted, and that to debate that measure was treason to the party. Within a few months we had a letter emanating from the White House in which it was asserted that men had been cut off from their usual share of patronage because they had dared to bid defiance to the Executive will, and yet later we saw that bill, amended in every single particular but one, every reactionary feature but one taken out of it, signed with an expression of approval from the Executive, who, according to the declaration of his clerk, had punished Senators for defying his will. That it was passed in defiance of Executive will and at the cost of patronage speaks well for Congress. I insist that Congressmen and Senators should have the right to defend the interests of the people free from the menace of Executive disfavor.

I say this not with reference to any feeling toward the Executive. I would say the same thing no matter who occupied that great office. I believe, Senators, the time has come when some one should stand on this floor and make his protest against legislation that is sent in here—working as this does a great injustice upon a large body of our people—with the injunction that it shall not be amended in a single particular, and that injunction coming from a source so potent, so far-reaching in its effect upon the political fortunes of Congressmen and Senators as the Chief Executive of this Nation.

I now address myself to the character of this so-called legislation, and in doing this I shall discuss the attitude and the policy of the Canadian Government. But I want it understood that I do it in no spirit of complaint against the Canadian Government. I admire beyond expression that splendid patriotism that has made the welfare of Canada the lodestar of its political and administrative policy.

I yield to no man in my admiration of that broad statesmanship of Canada which looks out for Canada, which looks out for Canada as an entirety, and which seeks to build up Canada in the interest of Canada. I believe in the time-honored maxims that "Charity begins at home," and "He who fails to provide for his family is worse than an infidel."

Now, then, we are told that if we amend this bill we will encounter not only Executive displeasure, but if we fail to pass it so as to meet the approval of Canada it will be the last chance that Canada will offer us for reciprocal trade agreements. A complete answer, however, to the proposition is found in the fact that the pending bill is not reciprocal. It is a grant of our market to Canada without any corresponding grant worth considering. In other words, it is the taking down of our tariff where Canada can successfully compete with us, and to say we can not do that at any time if we desire is absurd.

The President—and I shall have to refer frequently to the President, because he is the author of this bill, just as I would refer to a Senator had a Senator been the author of the bill—the President says that he tried to get certain concessions at the hands of Canada, but was unable to do so. He did not need to place himself at the mercy of Canadian diplomacy to learn that; a study of Canadian development and Canadian tariff policy would have saved him that trouble.

I want to invite the attention of the Senate to a consideration of Canada in her entirety. Canada stretches from one ocean to the other, a somewhat narrow strip in latitude, but as you go west of the Great Lakes and beyond the forests that adjoin the Great Lakes Canada broadens out into a wide expanse.

Canada is so situated that she never can build up a great manufacturing industry in her mid-continent possessions. In that respect Canada differs from this country, because our manufacturing interests have moved westward with the advance of population. But Canada, owing to the condition of her natural resources, must always have her industrial activities in the extreme east or the extreme west, while that great wider central expanse of Canadian territory must ever be devoted to agriculture and grazing purposes.

Canada has adhered persistently to one policy, and that is the policy of protection, and so insistent is Canada with reference to protection that she even insists upon a protective policy counter to the general current policy of the mother country.

Now, Canadian statesmanship is confronted with this situation—that the consumers of Canada and the western farmers of Canada must in some way be reconciled to the high tariff which Canada, in order to develop her eastern manufacturing, imposes upon manufactured articles coming into Canada, and there is only one way in which Canada can do that, and that is to find something that, so far as satisfying the Canadian western farmer, will take the place in his mind of a demand for a reduction upon manufactured articles and reconcile him to the maintenance of a Canadian tariff upon manufactured articles. Unless this is done sooner or later he will demand their abolition or material reduction.

I read from the President's address, delivered in Chicago. He says:

> Again, in our negotiations over this Canadian reciprocity treaty I directed our commissioners to secure as great a cut in the duties on manufactures in Canada as they could, but they were unable to secure any more than appears in this treaty, for the reason that Canada would not expose her manufacturers to the competition of American manufacturers, which is a very conclusive proof that the manufactured products that enter into the cost of living are higher in Canada than they are in the United States. Otherwise they would not fear the competition of American manufacturers.

Of course he could not; nor should he have expected, in view of the tariff history of Canada, to get any material reductions on manufactured articles. Canada has been determined for over half a century, and is determined now, to maintain her tariff wall against the United States upon manufactured articles just as long as she can, although to do that much longer she must in some way placate the western Canadian farmer. She is determined upon this because we can manufacture cheaper than she can, and to take her tariff wall down on manufactured articles would subject her to further competition and a greater influx of articles of American manufacture.

We do not need to waste any time upon that proposition, for the President's own statement in the closing lines of the paragraph I have quoted says:

> Canada would not expose her manufacturers to the competition of American manufacturers.

So we have the President's own statement that Canada would not sacrifice her interests by taking the wall down where we could compete, and the fact that she consents to take the wall down on farm products, by analogy of reasoning, shows that she does so because she can compete with us in farm products.

Now, I must digress a moment at this point to analyze this idea of reciprocity.

It is the subject of congratulation that as we have advanced in civilization we have blunted the somewhat rugged edges of human instinct and purpose; but human instinct and purpose survive, nevertheless. We may take on a certain finish of manner, we may take on a certain finish of expression, but self-interest is as absolutely the guiding star of activities to-day as it was before man had ever coined and conjured up attractive terms like "reciprocity." There never yet was a trade made in this world, from two boys trading jackknives unsight and unseen to two nations engaging in a treaty, but that each sought it because it thought it was to be the gainer. No nation will ever grant any reciprocity in anything unless that nation believes she is either acceding to a demand within her own borders or is getting something from the other nation which is an equivalent of what she gives.

So we may as well strip this of the attractive term "reciprocity" and call it simply a cold-blooded trade proposition, and the real motive on each side in a trade negotiation between countries is that each country wants the market of the other in those things it can produce cheaper than the other. Reduced to that analysis, what do we find? We find that Canada has already made one concession, not to the United States, for she never has and never will make a concession to the United States. When Canada took the duty off corn, she took it off as a concession not to us, but as a concession to the demand of the Canadian people, who could not successfully raise corn in competition with us. She has made the concessions to her own people in response to their demand, just as in this tariff bill that is pending we make a concession to our own people. The basis of this tariff bill on our side is the demand for free print paper, not as a desire to grant a concession to Canada, but because there is a demand within our own borders which must be heeded in the matter of tariff revision. If the demand for free paper must be complied with, it would have been far better to have done so directly without sacrificing the farming interest, as in this bill.

The principal thing which under this bill we do get into the Canadian market, in addition to what we already have, is southern fruit, and, obedient to the rule I have shown, southern fruit is certain in time to go into the Canadian market, not as a concession to the United States, but because fruit has become so general in its use to-day that the people universally demand it. Applying this principle, now, to the terms of this arrangement with Canada, what do we find? We find that Canada is confronted with the problem of maintaining her manufacturing interests by a tariff. To do that she must placate the western Canadian farmer, and consequently she stands where she has stood for the last 50 years, insisting that she will not take the tariff down as to American manufactured articles, but insisting that she must get us to take it down as to farm products, for the benefit of the Canadian farmer, that she may thus placate the Canadian farmer and reconcile him to the maintenance of the Canadian tariff wall upon American manufactured articles.

When this bill first came up there was quite an approval of it throughout the country. A great many men in my section of the country favored the bill because they believed that reciprocity meant something—that the giving of our markets to Canada involved the giving of the Canadian market to us. But gradually as they came to read the bill they discovered that there was nothing of the kind in it; that outside of southern fruits there was practically—broadly stated, of course, because there are always exceptions—no admission to the Canadian market that we do not have under existing law, and no material reduction of duties on those things we make cheaper than Canada, and, as they discovered this condition, approval of the bill began to abate.

But now some say "while the bill does not do what we thought it was doing, while the bill does not open the Canadian market to our people, yet it is a step in the right direction." I hardly know how to characterize that kind of a proposition. Here is the United States, and the only thing in the world that the United States has to trade with Canada is a market for farm products, because farm products can be produced cheaper in Canada than here, just as manufactured articles can be produced cheaper here than there. If we should open our doors to-day to every manufactured article in Canada it would not amount to anything, because, as the President himself so frankly admitted, the cost of manufacturing in Canada is greater than it is here.

On the other hand, Canada is still an importing country as to manufactured articles in excess of her production and until Canada develops her manufacturing to a point where she has something to export she will not be asking for a market for manufactured articles.

If to-day we should say to Canada, down goes our tariff wall on manufactured articles, it would not be any concession to Canada. It is nothing that Canada wants. The only thing that Canada wants is our market for farm products, and she wants that to placate her farmers and reconcile them to the Canadian tariff on manufactured articles, and now we propose to trade that off for nothing upon the theory that, having got rid of the only trading stock we have, we are going to get something in sound trade in the future. And that is characterized as statesmanship.

Compare that kind of a proposition with that broad, farseeing statesmanship of Canada, which insists on maintaining the tariff wall as to manufactured articles, but seeks to placate and reconcile her farmers to the maintenance of her tariff wall by securing to her farmers this great American market of ours. Not only that, but Canada never will take down her duties on manufactured articles until she is obliged to do so in response to a demand within her borders, largely from her farmers therefor. Just in proportion as by this bill we placate the Canadian farmer and reconcile him to the maintenance of the Canadian tariff against manufactured articles, just in that proportion we postpone the day when Canada will be obliged, in concession to her own people, to take down her wall upon manufactured articles. We are not only giving away all we have on earth to trade, but we are satisfying and reconciling the Canadian farmer with the high protective tariff Canada imposes upon manufactured articles; and to say that that is hastening the day when the tariff wall will come down it seems to me is as great a travesty on logic as it is to characterize it as statesmanship is a travesty on statesmanship. On the other hand, it is the absolute giving away of our stock in trade and postponing the hour when the Canadian farmer, in resentment at the burdens imposed upon him by the Canadian Government through her tariff wall, will insist upon that wall being removed.

The President says that this is the best he could get. Any student of American and Canadian tariff history would have known that. From the date when the tariff was framed in 1855 between Canada and the United States down to the present hour the one thing that every Canadian statesman, who has met a representative of our Government upon a reciprocal proposition, has insisted upon was that they would not yield upon their tariff as against manufactured articles.

I could stand here and read extracts from great Canadian statesmen, one after another, insisting that the one thing they would have would be the American market for their farm and natural products, and that they would grant nothing more. This is seen in the experiences of Presidents Grant and Harrison, who both undertook to negotiate trade relations with Canada, but in each case Canada insisted on her old-time policy of maintaining her tariff where we could compete and insisting on our taking ours down where she could compete, just as she has done in the present case, but, without meaning invidious comparison, both Grant and Harrison refused to submit to such a one-sided arrangement. When the President of the United States went into this arrangement and secured this kind of a deal with Canada he knew that this was the old-time policy in which Canada had never wavered. I am not complaining of Canada; I admire their statesmanship, their courage, and patriotism. The one thing in which they never have wavered is their refusal to yield anything against their own manufacturers. One thing that Canada has insisted on from the very beginning in any trade relation with us is the letting down of our bars against her farm and natural products, holding the fort where we could compete and asking us to yield where she could compete.

More than that, I say, without any spirit of criticism, there was nothing in the situation which demanded the President to place himself in a position where he was obliged to take this or anything else. Two years ago the Payne-Aldrich bill passed Congress. For two years among the American people the tide of resentment has been rising and rising against that bill. For two years the American people have borne the unjust burdens that that bill imposed upon them. There was an abundance of work for the President and Congress without the President entering into a position where he had to apologetically say "It was all I could get."

Compare this measure with itself and we find that while it makes no material reduction upon manufactured articles it places the products of the farm upon the free list. Two years ago I voted and worked against the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill for the simplest reason on earth, and that was because that bill was framed in the interest of the few and at the expense of the many. I desire to enter my protest against the too general extension of a free list in this country. A free list is a two-edged sword. A free list of raw materials, while it may be heralded as a downward revision, after all is the best friend the trusts have. While it may be secured in apparent advocacy of the rights of the people, it is the false friend of the people.

Taking the duty off of the raw material and leaving the duty on the finished product simply exposes the American producer of raw material to competition with other countries, and leaves the American consumer at the mercy of the protective tariff under an economic condition in which combination is far to fast taking the place of competition. Yet that is the plan upon which this bill is framed. While it takes the duty off of the raw material it leaves a duty upon the protected article.

I am a Republican. I stand upon the Republican platform that protection within the limits of the difference in the cost of production is a fair measure for the entire country. If it actually costs $1 to produce an article, and that is the honest and fair actual cost, every citizen of this Republic directly or indirectly may be said to participate in that cost. A duty of $1 that absolutely measures the difference in the cost of production is less of a wrong to the American people than a duty of 25 cents in excess of what the manufacturer requires. There is no escape from that conclusion.

Take the item of beef. No one will insist for one moment that our beef packers require a protective duty as against the labor employed in producing the finished product. Yet this bill takes the duty off the steer and leaves a larger direct protective duty, making allowance for the compensatory duty taken off the steer, than exists to-day on the beef itself under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

I submit figures and statistics upon that subject, prepared by an employee of the Treasury:

Effect of proposed reciprocity upon the protection to certain industries.

The President of the United States says that this measure is in harmony with Republican traditions and the utterances of great Republican leaders. In my creed a truth is just as much a truth before it is admitted as afterwards. The earth just as certainly revolved on its axis when all mankind believed it to be a flat plain as it does to-day. There is that in human nature that prompts us to turn to something outside of ourselves in support of our position, which may perhaps ward off criticism. So no matter how patent a truth may be, a man is inclined, especially if he is facing criticism, to cite somebody as authority for that truth, and the President cites such men as Blaine and McKinley.

The Republican platform wherever it has touched upon the question of a tariff has placed itself squarely and firmly for protection, and wherever the Republican Party has declared for reciprocity it has been as the handmaid of protection.

Mr. Blaine is quoted on this subject, and I submit the speech of Mr. Blaine delivered in 1874, when he was dealing with this very question of Canadian reciprocity. Of course I am aware, as every student of our country's history is, that in his latter days Mr. Blaine evolved the idea of reciprocity in noncompetitive articles with South America; but Mr. Blaine, so far as I know, in his whole career never for one moment assumed to take the position that reciprocity should include the surrender of our own products, our own industries, or the sacrifice of our own activities. I quote from his speech dealing with the very subject of Canadian reciprocity:

> Against the whole policy of adjusting revenue questions by the treaty-making power I desire to enter, on behalf of my constituents, an emphatic protest. The Constitution gives to the House of Representatives the sole and exclusive right to originate bills of revenue, and this great power should be kept where it can be controlled by the direct and unbiased vote of the people. It may be well that sundry articles of Canadian product should be admitted free, or with diminished duty; it may be well also that Canada would find it advantageous to admit certain articles from us free of duty. Let each country decide the question for itself and avoid the "log-rolling" feature of a treaty, in which it will inevitably happen that certain interests will be sacrificed in order that others may be promoted. Let us simply place Canada on the same basis with other foreign countries, taxing her products or admitting them free according to our own judgment of the interest of our own revenue and the pursuits and needs of our own people, always bearing in mind that in government as in family matters "charity begins at home," and that "he who provideth not for those of his own house is worse than an infidel."

While I do not assume that it will add anything to the force of Mr. Blaine's statement I also desire to enter my emphatic protest. I believe, sir, that a measure involving the welfare of 90,000,000 of people should be wrought out in the equation of Congress, imperfect as Congress is, as much given to delay as Congress is; that it should be wrought out in the equation of representatives from every section of this country, reflecting the environment of every section of the country. We will get a fairer disposition in that equation than any man in the seclusion of his office can ever hope to work out.

I have already shown that every country—and Canada is no exception to that rule—admits that which she is forced to admit by reason of a demand within her borders, just as we are conceding the proposition of paper in this country—not as a concession to Canada, but because of the demand in our own midst.

We find here this great farm interest ruthlessly sacrificed; we see here the Beef Trust bolstered; we see here the miller protected; we see here the contractor getting free rough lumber for ties and for bridge building, while the humble American home is being constructed with finished lumber upon which a duty is retained, and a greater duty, if you take into account the compensatory duty, than it was before the enactment of this bill.

Yet the man who penned those lines in defense of the broad equation in the consideration of American interests at the hands of legislation in a protest against the logrolling methods adopted in the treaty-making process is quoted as being in favor of the bill, which by its very terms strikes the duty down upon a group of articles where last year, and according to the very evidence furnished by the President, we have a balance of trade against us of $22,000,000, and leaves a greater direct protective tariff than ever when you take into account the compensatory duty upon the things that the people of this country eat, the bread, the meat, and the dressed lumber which the people use in the construction of their buildings. And yet James G. Blaine is quoted in defense of a proposition of that kind.

Then, again, the President turns to the name of McKinley, a name that Republicans are wont to conjure with and cites McKinley as in favor of a proposition of this character. We are all familiar with the last utterances of McKinley, but I shall read them into my remarks that they may go into the RECORD as part of my protest not only against the manner in which this legislation is brought here, but a protest against what is almost a sacrilege in view of the position which McKinley actually took. In that speech in Buffalo, when McKinley was in the shadow of impending death, he recorded for the last time with unabated loyalty his conviction of the Republican doctrine of protection. Three times on that day he spoke of the expansion of our market. He spoke of the fact that exclusiveness was a thing that had to be relegated to the past, but in every instance, never for one moment abating his loyalty to protection, he insisted that whatever be done should be done without injury to American labor or American industrial activities—

> By sensible trade arrangements, which will—

What? Strike at the great agricultural interests of this country? No; but—

> By sensible trade arrangements, which will not interrupt our home production, we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus.

Again, he says:

> If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home.

Will any man in face of the evidence that has been presented to the Committee on Finance question the necessity to-day of protection to the farming industries of this country? Whatever may have been said in the years gone by, as we have reached a point that our consumption is narrowing down to our production, every man realizes the benefits of the protective duty upon these articles.

I am not going to spend all my time, or ask the Senate to take its time, in analyzing the question whether you can board a farm laborer in Canada for $3.37 a week or in the United States for $3.37½. There is a broad concrete fact, which I shall give, that tells more than table upon table of statistics.

Take the figures which the President has submitted here; and when I speak in this connection of the last year I mean the fiscal year ending March 31, 1910, as that is the year covered by these figures. Take the items that this bill advances to the free list and group those items. The balance of trade last year on that group was against us to the extent of $22,000,000. Our entire balance of trade against Canada was $119,000,000, and to get that $119,000,000 we had to sell enough more stuff to make up the dead loss on farming products of $22,000,000 in the balance.

I know some critic may say that this should be $17,000,000 instead of $22,000,000, but the Senate will bear witness I use the term "advances to the free list."

I have already mentioned the fact that Canada has put our corn on the free list, not as a concession to us but a concession to the Canadian people. Eliminating corn, in which we had a balance last year of $4,000,000, and grouping the articles which this bill advances to the free list, there is a balance of trade against us of $22,000,000.

I realize that the balance of trade may mean much or it may mean little. If we should buy all our coffee of Venezuela or all our tea of Ceylon, we buy more than we would sell to those people, and it would simply mean that we bought our entire supply of coffee and tea from one country; but when you measure the balance of trade in competitive countries it means that the country which has the balance of trade is able to compete successfully with the country against which the balance of trade exists.

I was reading the other day that this would be a great opening for the farmers, because last year the American farmer shipped 7,680 tons of hay into Canada; but, in keeping with the general effort that has been made in favor of this bill, the author of that statement failed to state that last year Canada shipped 96,507 tons of hay into this country.

Take butter. Last year we shipped 61,000 pounds of butter to Canada. Canada shipped 980,000 pounds into this country. A great many people in defending this bill say, taking these figures only of the small importations, "Why, we can stand those importations," forgetting all the while that back of that importation of 980,000 pounds of butter lay 5,000,000 pounds more ready to come into this market, but which under existing conditions Canada had to send to England.

Now, it is proposed to give this butter market to Canada, and we take the English market in exchange; and that is about all there is of the element of reciprocity in this bill.

It is proposed to take one or two hundred million bushels of Canadian wheat—no one can tell how much it will develop—and we send that much more of our wheat to England and take the English price and the English market, exchanging the American market for the English market. If that is reciprocity, Heaven save the mark, and Heaven save us from any great surcharge of that sort of reciprocity.

I say again, the $22,000,000 balance against us absolutely demonstrates that that group of articles can not be produced in successful competition with the Canadian producer of those articles, and instead of listening to the warning of William McKinley, instead of having in mind these words:

If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home—

Or listening again to these words—

By sensible trade agreements, which will not interrupt our home production.

Instead of recognizing that, as the basis of legislation looking to trade relations, it is proposed now to take a group of articles showing in the balance of trade against us on that group our inability to compete in those articles and strike down the duty on that group as the basis of a trade relation; and I say again, the only trade we will get is that we trade our market for the English market. I deny that such a scheme is in harmony with Republican policies or the declarations of Republican leaders, not only is it unjust to the memory of Blaine and McKinley to try to distort their clear utterances for protection into support of this measure, but that this bill is repudiated by Republicans of our own generation is found in the fact that in the House a large majority of Republicans voted against it in February, and, taking into account our reduced numbers in the House now, a still larger percentage of Republicans voted against its passage in April, and a large majority of Republicans in this Chamber will vote against it. It will owe its passage to Democratic votes.

It is said that if this bill should be passed the great influx of wheat which will come into this country would steady the price of wheat. Does anyone suppose that shipping 100,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat into this country and we shipping 100,000,000 bushels to England would change the ultimate quantity of wheat at all? And that would be the result as to any quantity coming here under this bill from Canada. We give them our market and we take the foreign market. There is the same general production; there is the same general consumption.

Again, we are reminded that it would prevent gambling in wheat. There never was a time when gambling in wheat did not keep pace with increased production, and if the production of the world to-day could be doubled it would in no way lessen, but rather accentuate, gambling. In fact, we do not add anything to the vital supply. We only transfer one or two hundred million bushels, as the case may be, from Canada to our market, and in exchange we get the English market for the market which we surrender.

Now, speaking of this free list and free raw material, while the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] used the illustration, I am going to also use it, and say that the test of an honest revision is not the downward revision necessarily upon a free list composed of raw material. In the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill we had a great increase of the free list, and yet in that increased free list as it stands totalized to-day we only gave 20 per cent directly to the consumer and the other 80 per cent to the benefit of the man who handled the raw material. In other words, only 20 per cent of our present free list goes directly to the consumer, the other 20 per cent going first to the manufacturer.

There was a time in the history of tariff when we had competition and the cheaper the manufacturer got the raw material the cheaper he would sell in the market in competition; but when competition gives way to combination, then instead of helping the consumer by putting raw material on the free list you are simply taking money out of the Federal Treasury and putting it in the pockets of the trust, the combination, or the aggregation of those who use the free raw material and change it to the finished product before it reaches the consumer.

I declared two years ago, and I reiterate that declaration to-day, that, cost what it will of presidential disfavor, cost what it will of political fortune, I will never cast my vote for a tariff-revision bill until that bill has some just regard for the American consumer. He may be a stranger here, I think he seldom entered here in years gone by, but he is here, and he will be heard here hereafter. The vice of this bill, like the vice of the Payne-Aldrich bill, is that the ultimate consumer, according to the President's own admission, to which I will later refer, gets very little, if any, benefit.

We are told by the President of the United States that there are men who "vociferously" assume to defend the farming interests. It is also intimated that the opposition of the farmers has been worked up.

The farmer is a man who gets up in the morning before daylight and starts his farm work. All day long he toils in the fields and at night goes back and finishes his chores. It is true that in the last few years, owing to the unexampled prosperity of this country, that men here and there have been able to get ahead a little. That man reads of a tariff bill—a tariff bill that takes the duty off the wheat which he raises, but leaves it on the flour that he buys; a bill which takes the duty off the steer that he raises, but leaves the duty on the beef, if he does not himself slaughter it, that he may buy in the market; a bill that gives to a contractor free timber for bridges and ties, but leaves a duty upon the doors and window-sashes that go into the farmer's house; a bill that not only takes the duty off the farmer's wheat, but, as he develops into butter making, he necessarily does it somewhat at the expense of the grain raising, and so he has to buy bran and shorts—that farmer, with the tariff taken off his wheat and off his butter, reads a bill that leaves the duty on the bran and shorts that he must buy; and the President of the United States intimates that that farmer has to be told to rebel at that suggestion, that he has to be told to protest at the hands of some active and, as the President characterizes them, "vociferous friends of the farmer." I fear that that will not set kindly in the mind of the American farmer.

For years the American farmer has stood the brunt of this battle. He has been told "if you be patient, as we develop the manufacturing interests of this country we will make a home market for you"; and as we get that home market so near to where the difference of consumption and production is almost wiped out, then, without even giving the farmer a hearing, the benefit of the system is dug out from under his feet; and the President gives as a reason why he did the digging single-handed and alone that if others had been consulted in the framing of this bill there would have been a difference of opinion as to what the bill should contain. There is a truth that no enemy of the President, past or future, will ever question; there surely would have been a difference of opinion. That farmer, however, was entitled to be heard in the framing of a bill that was to come before this Congress with the prestige of a declaration for its passage without amendment from a man to whom to go counter meant disfavor with the administration. That farmer was entitled to be heard before he should be sacrificed in a bill that was to come here with a declaration that not a "t" should be crossed nor an "i" dotted. Yet we are told that that farmer had to be stirred up in order to oppose a measure of this kind.

In this connection I want to digress for a moment to say this: I think all Senators have noticed a change in the last few years. There was a time here when men who made it their business to create forces behind them, associations for and against things, would get a bill introduced, or would find a bill which had been introduced, and they would write out to their clientage, and back to us would come hundreds and thousands of stereotyped letters saying "Vote against House bill so-and-so," or "Vote for Senate bill so-and-so."

But Senators who have been here a few years will bear me witness that those stereotyped letters have disappeared; they no longer come here; but in the place of them there comes a letter, frequently written on half a page of somewhat faded paper, by a man whose hand you can see has been cramped and crabbed with toil, written with a pen rusty because of disuse, but the wording of that letter, giving that man's reason for opposing or favoring a bill, while it may be evidence of a crabbed hand, half-faded paper, and rusty pen, nevertheless it bespeaks an intelligence and independence on the part of the writer.

I want on this floor to-day to sound a note of warning to some men in this country who imagine that the intelligence of the American people and the independence of the American people are not aroused upon this and other great questions. As to intimating that the American farmer had to be stimulated to oppose a measure which struck at his very life, as does this bill, I fear it will not set well with the American farmer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator from Minnesota any figures to show the extent to which the farmers of his State have protested against this bill by letters such as he has described?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I want to warn the Senator from Nebraska that that is an unsafe criterion. The board of trade, the chamber of commerce, the organization can speak, but you and I must stand here for the man who lives out from the railroad, out from the city, and is not a part and parcel of some organization, and the man who makes an effort to establish an equation numerically between those forces which are organized and those forces which are scattered out in the homes of this country will make a great mistake. I have no hesitation in saying from the character of the protests which I have received, from the number of letters which I have received, and from my knowledge of the men and their relation to their surroundings, that Minnesota is simply overwhelmingly against this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I asked that question——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I asked that question because every test which I have made in Nebraska has indicated that the farmers have comparatively little interest in this bill, and has indicated that there was certainly a very small amount of sentiment against it among them.

Moreover, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to another form of proof. A few weeks ago in the ninth district of the State of Iowa there was a special election to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Hon. Walter I. Smith from the House of Representatives. In that election the issue was squarely made. The Democratic candidate declared for the reciprocity bill; the Republican candidate declared against the reciprocity bill; and in that district, which had given Republican majorities in the past up to 5,000, the Republican candidate received a majority of only about twelve hundred.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; and I want——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he sees in those figures any indication of a general uprising among the agriculturists of the West against this reciprocity bill?

Mr. CLAPP. I do. As to the district that Mr. Walter I. Smith, by the strength of his personality, was able to hold against a protest that swept away stronger personalties than his in some instances, because of the resentment against the action of Congress two years ago, the Senator from Nebraska must remember that it was the refrain of that issue that also cut down that majority as it was the refrain of that issue that brought the distinguished Senator from Nebraska to our midst. When you realize that those people in midsummer, depending upon representatives as they should, will gather in numbers like that it means something.

Mr. Smith's last majority was only 1,500, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] advises me. I do not know of a thing which has occurred during all of this summer which to my mind has been so significant as that election in the State of Iowa, when you consider all things and consider the condition that grew out of the situation two years ago, which to-day hangs like a pall over our party from one end of the country to the other.

No; the farmer does not need to write. He does not need to be told. I do not know anything of the farmers of the State of Nebraska, except I know one thing, that in speaking through that State, I discovered that they were very enthusiastic in their indorsement of the present Senator from Nebraska, because, among other things, and I think more than all else, he had stood not in harmony with the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, but, on the contrary, in opposition to it.

It will not do for us to deceive ourselves by the numerical equation of those who petition for a bill or protest against it. The test is the manner of the protest or petition rather than the number of letters. I have received hundreds of letters, especially in the early days of this controversy, from the larger cities of my State. Those letters almost without exception simply contained the statement, "We wish you to vote for reciprocity." Well, of course, it is unnecessary for me to say that if the contingency should ever present itself of voting for real genuine reciprocity, I would probably do so, but reciprocity is one thing and this Canadian tariff bill is another thing. There is not enough reciprocity about this bill to serve as a label. They were probably themselves impressed with the word "reciprocity," and, believing the bill was reciprocal, they used that term in their correspondence. But you take the men who have written against this bill, and they have sat down and given their reasons for opposing it. A letter from one man who gives his reasons for opposing a thing counts more in my mind, so far as the question raised by the Senator from Nebraska is concerned, than a hundred mere naked directions to vote for or against a measure.

I say again the farmer reads these things. Take the farmers who appeared before the Finance Committee. Many of them, to my knowledge, have never believed in protection, but they come down here now and they say: "We have paid for this market in the years in which we have sustained protection"—of course this is not advanced to the Senator from Nebraska, but it is an argument advanced to the men who have advocated protection—they say, "We have paid for this market, and now we are entitled to the market." They say, "If you are going to take the duty off of what we sell, then take the duty off of what we buy." Does any Senator believe that a farmer or any other man is so blind and senile intellectually that he does not recognize the injustice of taking the duty off of about everything on earth that he produces and leaving the duty where it is on about everything which he purchases?

It is the injustice of this bill against which I protest. It strikes beyond the mere question of dollars and cents. I hope it will also strike a blow to this policy of one man—and I am not now speaking of the man, but of the policy—of one man arrogating to himself the discharge of a trust to the people of all the United States in the framing of a bill and telling the people what is for their good. Before the duty was taken off of wheat and left on flour, before it was taken off of the steer and left on the beef, the men who raised the wheat and the steer, on the one hand, and the consumers, on the other, who buy flour and beef, had a right to be heard. I am contending for a forum where legislation shall be shaped so that the legislation and those affected by it may get some benefit of the equation under the system of diversified and widely extended representation.

There is one thing more that I am going to call attention to. I spoke of my protest against this form of legislation, because it is calculated to silence those who have suffered injustice and wrong; it is calculated to silence the advocates of those who have been wronged in legislation; and I come now to an example of that kind in this controversy. I hold in my hand, sir, what purports to be a speech made by the Secretary of State of the United States in the city of Chicago on the 15th day of February, 1911. He opens that speech with this declaration:

> Trade between the United States and the British Provinces was, up to 1845, burdened with a system of differential duties which discriminated against foreign importations into Canada in favor of the British. In 1845 the British Government authorized the Canadian Legislature to regulate its own tariff. Canada, now autonomous as to tariffs, generously and almost at once removed the existing differential duties and admitted American goods on the same terms as those imported from Great Britain. This change gave a great impetus to importations from the United States.

Now, mark the skill with which this statement is put before the American public—the fact of a burden upon trade with Canada accentuated by differentials in which Canada discriminated against foreign countries in favor of Great Britain. This is followed by the statement that as soon as Canada could do so—"in 1845 the British Government authorized the Canadian Legislature to regulate its own tariff" and to admit "American goods on the same terms as those imported from Great Britain," leaving the impression upon the reader that the discrimination in favor of Great Britain had never been restored. There could have been no other purpose than to leave that impression. Independent of the purpose of creating that impression, the paragraph has no relation to the discussion of the present Canadian tariff bill.

If that statement had been made by a Member of the House of Representatives or by a Senator, a Representative or a Senator could meet it, but that being made by the Secretary of State, there is no official who can defend the farmers and the consumers of this country and who can meet that statement from the standpoint of official equality with the Secretary of State; and there is perhaps a feeling that because he is Secretary of State that fallacy ought not to be exposed.

What was the purpose of making that declaration to the American people? The Secretary of State and every one else familiar with the American character knows that generosity is an overmastering instinct of American human nature, and by saying to the American people that while down to that time our trade with Canada had been burdened with a differential in favor of Great Britain, yet Canada, grand and generous in her impulses, the moment she got the opportunity, removed that differential, I submit that there is no man, unless he knew the history of Canadian tariff legislation, who would read that paragraph but would at once draw the conclusion that that differential was still removed. What place has such a statement in a tariff discussion if the differential were simply taken off and put back? None. The inference is that that differential remained removed; and yet the Secretary of State and the President, under whose authority he must have made that declaration, know that that differential was soon put back, is in force to-day, and this reciprocity tariff bill with Canada does not even pretend to remove it; yet that statement of the Secretary of State, with its appeal to the generous impulses of the American heart, has gone to thousands and thousands of men who never will hear of the restoration and the retention of that differential. That is one of the reasons why I object to legislation being framed and forced through Congress in this manner.

It is human nature for men who frame a measure to go beyond the limits of fairness in their zeal of advocacy for that measure, and when you throw against the privileges, rights, and interests of a great body of American people the prestige of a great office so that a man stands in the shadow of its disapproval if he goes contrary to its dictation and challenges the fairness of a great minister of State in the defense of the rights of his people, I say the time has come when there ought to be a protest entered against forming and seeking to pass legislation in this manner.

I think that is all I care to submit to-day. This bill is not a reciprocal measure. It does not meet the reciprocal or the economic relations of the two countries. It strikes a hard blow at our agricultural interests and feeds the consumer on the husks of an ill-conceived promise, because, after all his effort in this behalf, after all his speeches have been made, the President, finally driven from one point to another, admitted in his Indianapolis speech:

> It is my own judgment that the reciprocity agreement will not greatly reduce the cost of living, if at all.

And yet we have been called here in an extra session—this country is already to-day feeling the paralysis of this proposed legislation—and we gain absolutely nothing save the admission of some far southern fruits which Canada sooner or later, in obedience to the demands of her own people, has got to admit within her borders. In the last analysis we are told by the author of the bill that the ratification of the reciprocity agreement will not materially, if at all, reduce the cost of living. I quote now the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in his defense of this bill:

> The intention of this proposal for reciprocity is not to reduce the price of articles sold by the farmer.

If you do not reduce the price of wheat, how in the name of reason do you expect to reduce the price of flour, when you take the duty off of wheat and leave a duty on flour? If you do not reduce the price of the steer, is there any man bold enough to assert that you reduce the price of the dressed beef, when you have left a duty on dressed beef? So, after all this hysteria, after trying to give to Canada the last thing we have to trade for the opening of her markets, after surrendering the only weapon we have by which we can force Canada, in concession to her western farmers, to take down her tariff wall, we are told in the last analysis that it was not the purpose of this measure to reduce the price of farm products. We are told by the author of the bill that this measure will not materially, if at all, reduce the cost of living; and it does seem to me that that ends the proposition.

I have spoken of the effect of this measure upon the farmer. That is because the blow falls heaviest, primarily, upon him. I would defend from injustice any other class or calling, and those who criticize us for speaking of the farmer in connection with this bill must remember that he is the one who suffers first from the effect of this bill. But you can not strike a blow at the agricultural interests of the country without its being reflected along every channel and avenue of our industrial and commercial life. This is already beginning to be seen in the business depression which is being experienced in connection with the certainty of the passage of this bill.

As was said by the Association of Minnesota Manufacturers in their recent publication:

> If the treaty is a bad thing for the Northwestern farmers, it is a bad thing for us. Our principal trade comes and will continue to come from the Northwest, and anything that injures that section will injure us.

Stating this more broadly, with the entire country, whatever injures the agricultural interests will be a blow at the general welfare.

Now, with the President's own admission as to its not decreasing the cost of living to the consumer, a fair deduction from the President's own declaration that this bill will not help the consumer, I shall vote against the bill and am willing to submit my course in regard to this legislation to the people, whom, in connection with my distinguished colleague, I ever seek to serve.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, at the outset I want to encourage my friends who do me the honor to listen to me by assuring them that I am not going to speak very long this hot afternoon. I apprehend that anything that might be said at this stage of the proceedings will have very little, if any, effect on the final vote. My judgment is that if, as was said of old, some one rose from the dead and offered himself as a witness in the matter of Canadian reciprocity, it would have no possible effect in changing the vote of any Senator. Yet, Mr. President, to give evidence of the faith that is within me regarding the matter I want to submit briefly a few remarks.

Mr. President, the Senate is confronted by a strange spectacle. A minority of the Republican membership of this body, almost without exception made up of Senators from the manufacturing States of the East—Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, and Illinois—are in alignment with an overwhelming majority of the Democratic Senators to enact into law a tariff measure, misnamed a reciprocity treaty, which, stripped of all disguises is simply a tariff bill for full "free trade in all agricultural products" under the guise of reciprocity with Canada.

Supporting this same movement for "free trade in farm products," we find aligned in solid phalanx practically the entire daily newspaper press of the great cities, both those that have been and are the advocates of a "protective tariff" and those who have been and are demanding either "free trade" or "tariff for revenue only."

In this new political alliance we see Mississippi and Massachusetts hand in glove and Pennsylvania and South Carolina joyously acclaiming the newly proclaimed political economy that proposes protective-tariff duties for every class of American citizens and American industries except it be for that portion of our population that earn their living in agricultural pursuits.

At the same time we see in solid opposition to the measure every Republican Senator, with only three exceptions, from the great agricultural States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, and Montana, and the three agricultural New England States—Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont.

For this strange and heretofore unheard-of political alliance there must be some profound and basic reason.

For nearly three solid months the Senate has been in session to consider and debate the pending measure, and while very many Senators have been heard in denunciation of the bill only two or three Senators have yet raised their voices in even mild defense of it.

There is another strange and unheard-of procedure attending this matter. After six weeks of hearings on the bill by the Finance Committee, and after listening to hundreds of witnesses as to the ultimate effect of its provisions on the agricultural interests of the country, nearly every one of those witnesses giving testimony adverse to its merits, the Finance Committee sends the bill back to the Senate without either a favorable or an adverse report accompanying it.

FREE PRINT PAPER.

Yet the great daily newspapers are proclaiming that it must and shall be passed by the Senate "without amendment"; that no man dare lay unholy and profane hands upon it in any way.

Is it not at least an extraordinary situation that reveals the entire daily newspaper press, with hardly an exception, lined up in solid support of this tariff measure that is misnamed reciprocity.

I fully realize the tremendous and overwhelming power of the press to create and foster public opinion. Its power for good can not be estimated. When wielded in a common cause it is irresistible. It is practically the only means for the wide dissemination of information.

Generally speaking, the press intends to be fair. But the owners of newspapers are human. They are not entirely above all the selfish interests that admittedly dominate the rest of their fellow creatures.

We know the campaign for "free print paper" that has been carried on with such persistent purpose since 1907.

In January last the President transmitted to Congress the present so-called Canadian reciprocity treaty, providing for free trade in farm products while still maintaining duties on all manufactured articles, "print paper" being the one shining exception to the rule.

A few days later the powerful "American Newspaper Publishers' Association" sent out instructions, marked "private to editors," as follows:

> It is of vital importance to the newspapers that their Washington correspondents be instructed to treat favorably the Canadian reciprocity agreement, because print paper and wood pulp are made free of duty by this agreement.

I am neither arguing pro or con as to whether as a matter of right or good business judgment the comparatively small duty of about 9 per cent, or $3.75 per ton, on print paper should be removed in a general tariff bill, but is not the price to be paid by the farmers of this country in the way of free trade in all farm products for the remission of the small duty on "print paper" a tremendous one?

Day after day we have been only too familiar with the staring headlines in the daily newspapers:

> Reciprocity sure to pass. President will force Congress to act. No amendments will be tolerated to reciprocity bill. President will veto reciprocity if amended. Senators will feel the big stick. Farmers' opposition only inspired by the Lumber Trust—

And so on ad infinitum et nauseam.

I have been reading with much interest the series of articles by Will Irwin, now running in Collier's Weekly, on the history of newspapers in this country, and was impressed with his eminently fair and impartial treatment of this most interesting phase of our national development.

After paying full and well-deserved tribute to the great work done by the press, he also turns on a light as to the relation that sometimes exists between the "business office" and the editorial and news columns.

When Canadian reciprocity has become a law, I would suggest to Mr. Irwin that he might add a most interesting chapter on the relation between the campaign for Canadian reciprocity and the "free print paper" clause in the pending bill.

It is indeed gratifying to find three or four of the great daily newspapers that are frank enough to tell the whole story of the relation of "free print paper" and its relation to so-called reciprocity.

In a recent issue the Philadelphia North American said editorially:

> But merely because we consider honest and equitable a reduction of the paper schedules of the tariff which would save The North American large sums of money every year is no reason why this newspaper should give its indorsement to an agreement which is to our self-interest, but seems more and more like a sham and a perversion of real reciprocity.
> If any American will profit thereby, save the Beef Trust, the millers, the organized middlemen, and the newspapers, we are unable to see who they can possibly be.

Yet this measure is one that did not originate in either branch of Congress. The legislative branch of the Government had nothing to do with its inception.

The profound silence of its friends in the Senate Chamber is unexplainable.

Until the agricultural papers of the country began some weeks ago to print the real facts in the case, the people generally were under the honest belief that the so-called reciprocity bill actually meant free trade with Canada in both manufactured and agricultural products.

WHAT THE BILL MEANS.

I think I make no misstatement of fact when I say that the avowed purpose of the measure is free trade in agricultural products, at the same time retaining the tariff duties on all manufactured articles, except print paper.

In plain words the effect of the treaty is to cheapen the value of the products of our farms for the benefit of the cities and manufacturing centers of the East, and to give the newspapers "free print paper."

The whole arrangement being at the sole expense of the farmers of this country. In return he gets nothing, while we remit the $5,000,000 that is now annually collected on Canadian imports.

Its avowed purpose is to reduce the cost of living to the population of the cities by lowering the price of agricultural produce.

It is for the city and against the country.

It is for the manufacturers and against the farmers.

It is for the East and against the West.

It is class legislation of the most offensive kind.

The only argument advanced in its favor is that "it will not hurt the farmer—much."

It has been sailing under the false colors of "reciprocity." That is a beautiful name. It rolls from the tongue with a sweet accent. The very term "reciprocity" appeals to the better instincts of men. It is like the words "religion," "equity," "goodness," "mercy," "harmony," and other sweet-toned words that appeal to our better nature.

But the man who is enamored at the thought of real "reciprocity with Canada" had better not read any more of the pending bill than its title page if he does not want to be disabused of his first impressions.

Otherwise he will experience a feeling akin to that which a deeply religious person would experience should he pick up a nicely bound volume labeled Bunyan's "The Pilgrim's Progress" and discover within the tales of "The Decameron."

NOT OPPOSED TO REAL RECIPROCITY.

I want to say in the outset that I am not opposed to real reciprocity with Canada. I would welcome it.

I would not oppose absolute free trade in both manufactured articles as well as farm products with our northern neighbor, where conditions and climate and language and people are so closely akin.

What I do object to is making fish of one industry and flesh of another.

The line of demarkation that runs throughout the entire bill is fundamentally wrong.

We have repeatedly asked, and no one has yet answered, Why are all the products of the farm to be placed on the free list when, by the terms of the same bill, everything the farmer purchases continues to be protected by tariff duties?

The questions yet remain unanswered why, under this bill:

The present duty of 25 cents per bushel is taken from wheat and the tariff of 50 cents per barrel is to be maintained on flour for the millers and 17½ per cent on "prepared cereal foods."

Why the duty of 15 cents per bushel is taken from oats and the duty of 50 cents per hundredweight remains on oatmeal?

Why the duty of 30 cents per bushel is taken from barley and the duty of 45 cents per hundred retained on "barley malt"?

Why, with the duty removed from the farmers' wheat, there should be retained a 25 per cent ad valorem duty on "biscuits, wafers, and cakes"?

Why the duty of 27½ per cent ad valorem is taken from cattle, $1.50 per head from sheep, and $1.50 per head from hogs, raised on the farm, and a duty of 1¼ cents per pound is retained for Armour and Swift on bacon, lard, beef, mutton, pork, and all other dressed meats?

Why the present duty of 6 cents per pound on butter and 6 cents on cheese is taken away and the duty of 20 per cent is retained on the churn that makes the same butter?

Why the present duty of $4 per ton is removed from hay, and the farmer is still compelled to buy his "mowers and horse-rakes" and other farming implements under a 15 per cent duty and "hay tedders" under a 20 per cent duty?

Why all vegetables are put on the free list and yet a duty of 1¼ cents per pound is still retained on "tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn, in cans"?

We have inquired why under this misnamed reciprocity treaty everything on earth that the farmer raises except wool—and sheep unshorn can also be brought in free—has gone on the free list and everything on earth that he buys still retains a tariff duty, and no one has answered.

Mr. President, there must be some reason why this bill is being urged for passage, and I hope I am fair-minded enough to discuss frankly the reason urged by some of its proponents for this new departure in our present financial system.

INCREASE IN PRICES.

Since 1896 there has been a steady increase in the price of all commodities. The upward movement of prices has not been confined to the United States, but has been world-wide.

During the same period there has been witnessed a great world-wide movement for the combination of capital in all forms of commercial enterprise.

It has been the era that has witnessed the formation of the great industrial combinations that are popularly known as trusts and combines.

During this 15-year period the tremendous organization of the labor unions has taken place.

Practically every form of labor except the farmer has now become organized into industrial and trades unions that embrace within their membership an overwhelming majority of the workers of the United States.

The great combinations of trade and commerce have been most successful in "steadying" and "regulating" the price of their commodities.

The testimony presented by the Government in the famous Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases, the testimony of Judge Gary before the House committee regarding the workings of the Steel Trust, leaves no possible room for doubt as to the effect of these great combinations of capital on the selling prices for every commodity known to modern business.

The successful demands of the labor unions for shorter hours and increase of wages have also largely contributed to the upward trend of prices.

INCREASE IN GOLD COINAGE.

There is another factor that has also been of tremendous importance in this world-wide movement of advance in prices.

According to the last report of the Director of the Mint, from the date of the discovery of America in 1492 down to 1896, a period of over 400 years, the total world production of gold, the unit and yardstick of all values, reached a total of $8,850,000,000. In the past period of 15 years, since 1896, the production of gold has been $5,000,000,000.

In other words, during the past 15 years there has been poured into the world's coinage of gold $5,000,000,000, or more than 56 per cent additional to the entire gold production of the world in the 400-year period preceding. In the 400 years, from 1492 to 1896, $8,000,000,000; in the past 15 years a little over $5,000,000,000.

The purchasing power of the gold dollar has in the 15-year period since 1896 shrunk more than one-third.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

In the face of this great increase in price values there has arisen a cry against "the increased cost of living." It has been felt most by those having a "fixed income."

The wages of the wage earner has probably about kept even pace with the increased price of commodities.

The man with the "fixed income" has felt the "increased cost of living" more than any other class.

Hence a protest has gone up everywhere and from all quarters against "the increased cost of living."

Forgetting how we struggled against and prayed for a relief from "low wages" and "low prices" that blasted and scorched and dried up the industrial life of this Nation in the years immediately preceding the year 1897 the people are now demanding relief from "high prices" and the "high cost of living."

I think it fair to assume that the inception of this so-called reciprocity treaty arose from that protest against "the high cost of living." Frankly speaking, it was an attempt to somewhat "lower the cost of living" to the people of the cities and manufacturing centers at the expense of the farming classes and rural communities of this country.

I have no question that the President, when the idea was suggested to him, acted solely from a good impulse and without a full understanding of its final meaning.

It is my opinion that in his desire to respond to what he believed to be a popular demand, voiced largely through the columns of the great daily newspapers, reflecting only the sentiment of the cities, he yielded to the suggestion, forgetting that the proposition thus proposed to "lower the cost of living" to the people of the cities and manufacturing centers was in reality a canabalistic scheme to do so at the expense of the other half of our people who are engaged in agricultural pursuits.

My protest against this propaganda for lowering "the cost of living" to one portion of our people at the direct expense of the other portion is that it is not fair or equitable.

If tariffs are to be reduced in order to cheapen prices, then let the reduction be made general, all along the line, to manufacturers and farmers alike.

Let us not attempt to have "free trade in farm products" at the expense of the farmer while retaining high duties on manufactured articles coming from foreign countries.

Let us not make fish of one industry and fowl of another industry.

Yet while urging the passage of this reciprocity bill with the avowed purpose of "lowering the cost of living" and lowering the cost of "print paper" its supporters attempt to say "the farmer won't be hurt—much." They say the price of wheat is fixed at Liverpool, which is not true, as was conclusively shown by the two Senators from North Dakota and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] by a cold recitation of the actual market reports.

Let me again read the statement of actual market price for wheat and barley on the same day in the Canadian markets and in the American markets, situated only a few miles distant on the other side of the international boundary line:

[2] Holiday.

On the 7th day of January there was 14 cents difference in our favor. On the 14th there was still a difference of 13 cents in our favor. On the 21st it was about the same. On the 28th, after we had a report of the effect of this reciprocity agreement and its likelihood to pass this Congress, Winnipeg went up and Minneapolis went down. Winnipeg went up about 1½ cents, from 93 to 94½, and Minneapolis went down from $1.08 to $1.03; so it made a difference of about 6½ cents a bushel, resulting from the fact that the bill had been reported to the Congress of the United States.

MONTANA WHEAT PRODUCTION.

Mr. President, the State of Montana, which is popularly supposed to be a mining State, alone will produce this year nearly 20,000,000 bushels of wheat, and Prof. Thomas Shaw, the agricultural expert of the Great Northern Railroad, says that the undeveloped lands of Montana will easily produce 400,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. The method of dry farming has revolutionized agricultural conditions in the West. The old dollar and a quarter sheep pasture of the bygone days is now the land that produces 30 to 40 bushels of hard wheat per acre.

I think it will be conceded that the average market price of wheat in the Northwest is 10 cents per bushel more on our side of the line than on the Canadian side.

The passage of this bill means that the wheat farmers of Montana will suffer a loss of $2,000,000 in the market price of this year's wheat crop alone.

The farmers of Montana alone will this year raise about 3,000,000 bushels of barley.

It is admitted by all that the market price of barley will average about 25 cents per bushel more on the American side of the line than on the Canadian side. The removal of the 30 cents per bushel duty on barley will this year cost the farmers of Montana not less than $750,000.

The inevitable result will be the tremendous development of the immense Canadian Northwest at the expense of our own people.

The inevitable result will be the general depreciation of our undeveloped farming lands and the same proportionate enhancement in value of the undeveloped farming lands of western Canada.

In anticipation of the passage of this bill the emigration into northwestern Canada is already being accentuated.

The belief that they will soon obtain free entrance into our market is already causing a boom in western Canadian lands. In this morning's Washington Herald I notice the following press dispatch, which tells the story of the inevitable result of the passage of this bill:

CHICAGO, July 9.

Hope for cheaper meats in the United States is held out by the rapid growth of the alfalfa-fed beef cattle and sheep industry in the western Provinces of Canada, attention to which has just been called by the arrival in that section of the advance guard of an invading army of Australian sheep growers. F. W. Fairbain, an Australian wool king, with headquarters in London, recently purchased 4,000 acres in Alberta for sheep-raising purposes. Mr. Fairbain is the largest grower of wool in the world, and his determination to have his son engage in the sheep industry in western Canada is taken as an indication that his future operations on a large scale will be on this continent.

Most people are of the honest belief that the proposed legislation is something new and untried, and say, "If it is not a success, we can repeal it." They do not know that we are merely repeating that which was heretofore tried and overwhelmingly repudiated as a total failure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish the Senator would read the rest of the article that he refers to about the gentlemen about to purchase a tract of land in Canada. I think there is something that follows that which would read strongly in the interest of reciprocity or cheaper food.

Mr. DIXON. I will let the Senator——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That article goes on to say, if you will permit me——

Mr. DIXON. I do not yield to the Senator for a speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana will not further yield.

Mr. DIXON. I yield for a question. But the Senator from New Jersey can use that article in his own speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not care to make a speech. I only desired to have the Senator read the article in full.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator can do that in his own time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana declines to yield further.

HISTORY OF RECIPROCITY.

Mr. DIXON. From 1816 to 1854 the United States Government was continually importuned to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with Canada. On account of her being compelled to seek a market for her exports, which consisted chiefly of the so-called raw products of the farm and the forests, Canada naturally sought an outlet in the markets of the United States.

In 1854 a reciprocity treaty was negotiated. It was to continue for 10 years with the right of termination upon 12 months' notice by either party. It was terminated in 1866 upon notice given by the United States 1 year before.

As the period of the natural existence of the treaty drew to an end, the British Minister at Washington, at the instance of Canada, made every effort to secure its prolongation. But on January 18, 1865, notice was given by the United States Government of its intention to abrogate the treaty on the ground "that it was no longer for the interest of the United States to continue the same in force," and all attempts at arranging a prolongation came to an end in February, 1866.

In this matter I would recall, for our present guidance, Patrick Henry's famous remark: "I have no lamp to guide my feet except the lamp of experience."

BLAINE'S RECIPROCITY.

In discussing the effects of the Canadian reciprocity treaty of 1854, Mr. Blaine, in his "Twenty Years of Congress," says:

The selection, as shown by the schedule, was made almost wholly to favor Canadian interests. There was scarcely a product on the list which could be exported from the United States to Canada without loss, while the great market of the United States was thrown open to Canada without tax or charge for nearly everything that she could produce and export. All her raw materials were admitted free. It had served its purpose admirably as a makeweight for Canada in acquiring the most generous and profitable market she had ever enjoyed for her products.

That was Mr. Blaine's testimony.

In 1875 Canada again, through the British minister at Washington, renewed negotiations for another "reciprocity treaty."

In discussing the agitation for a renewal of the former reciprocity treaty with Canada, Senator Morrill, of Vermont, on February 3, 1875, in this Chamber, said:

The abrogated reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, relating to her Canadian Dominion, having proven profitable to our northern neighbors and unprofitable to us, it is not wonderful that they should seek in some form an early renewal of its advantageous conditions, nor is it wonderful that we should scan fresh proposals from that quarter with disgust. The Dominion Government maintained during the last session of Congress a confidential embassy at Washington to manufacture or to create a public opinion at our capital through diligent diplomacy and diligent use of the public press in favor of a new reciprocity treaty.

While considering any new reciprocity proposals, the effect of the old treaty should be constantly borne in mind. Our exports to Canada in 1855 were $20,828,676, but in 12 years, under the operation of "reciprocity," or in 1866, they had fallen to $15,243,834, showing a positive decrease of over $5,000,000. Yet the exports of Canada to the United States during the same time, which were in 1855 only $12,182,314, had increased in 1866 to $46,199,470. When our treaty began, the balance of trade was $8,000,000 annually in our favor, and at the end the balance to be paid in specie was $30,000,000 in one year against us. That was reciprocity which can not be dwelt upon with composure or that we can afford to have repeated.

In the same speech in the Senate, Senator Morrill said:

Reciprocity, formerly a word of deceitful sweetness, has turned out a bitter-sweet, the smart from which leaves no relish for a second taste.

Continuing, he said:

True, the reciprocity treaty of 1854, pitilessly terminated, as it was, by congressional direction at the earliest practicable day, is still preserved, in spite of its repulsive memories, as a precedent; but a bad precedent, solitary and alone, stands only as a scarecrow in the field to prevent one of the gravest blunders in our diplomacy from being repeated.

Again, he said:

But consumers here would be only benefited by just the amount of injury inflicted upon our agricultural producers. Agriculturists have been want to encourage manufacturers, because that policy adds to the number of consumers of their products and correspondingly diminishes competitors among themselves.

I want the Senators from the manufacturing States of the East to pay special attention to Senator Morrill's words. They apply with special force to the present situation. He said:

But how long could farmers be expected to sustain a tariff upon manufactures if all their own products are to be exceptionally exposed to a northern blast of free trade? After such an exposure any harmonious policy as to a tariff even for revenue would be indefinitely foreclosed. Protection that does not protect farmers will not be long likely to protect anybody. Our farmers feel a profound interest in the Government they support, and they expect the Government to reciprocate that interest by more regard than is extended to the farmers of any other country, who have nothing at stake but the profits and loss of trade.

In 1892 the Dominion of Canada again sought to renew the provisions of the old treaty. But President Harrison, in his message to the Senate on June 20, 1892, said:

A reciprocity treaty limited to the exchange of natural products would have been such only in form. The benefits of such a treaty would have inured almost wholly to Canada. Previous experiments on this line had been unsatisfactory to this country. A treaty that should be reciprocal in fact and of mutual advantage must necessarily have embraced an important list of manufactured articles.

And so the matter rested until the present time, when the present treaty is presented covering practically the same articles produced on the farms and ranges as in the old treaty of 1854, but introducing the new item of "free print paper."

Mr. President, I will venture this assertion: If the 6,000,000 farmers of this country knew exactly the terms of this bill and were organized as the trades and professional men of this country are organized to look after matters of legislation affecting their interests, and through such organizations were here demanding that their business interests receive the same fair treatment that other business interests are accorded, I doubt if this misnamed reciprocity treaty would receive a half dozen votes on the floor of this Senate.

JAMES J. HILL.

I noticed in the daily papers the other day an interview with that great railroad magnate, James J. Hill, whose branch lines of railroad penetrate in a dozen places the great Canadian wheat fields and farms of western Canada, and whose railroad system will reap untold millions of dividends under Canadian reciprocity from the enormous tonnage they will haul from Canadian farms into our own market.

In the interview he strongly advocates this treaty. He denounces as "ghost dancers" the Senators and Congressmen who have tried to prevent this great injustice being perpetrated on the farmers of this country.

It is a "ghost dance," Mr. President, and like Banquo's ghost it will return to plague the interests that are forcing this one-sided tariff legislation into the political economy of this country.

I received a letter the other day from a farmer in the Gallatin Valley, out in Montana, the most fertile grain valley in the world, in which he refers to Mr. Hill's famous interview on "ghost dancers," which I want to read. It may be of interest to some of you:

BOZEMAN, MONT., June 16, 1911.

I see by press reports that the opposition to the so-called reciprocity agreement by the farmers is not real; that it is being fostered by the "lumber interests," etc. Anyone making any such statement either does so willfully or has taken no pains to correctly inform himself of the true feeling of the farmers. The farmers of this valley are practically a unit in opposition, and we do not need any "ghost dances" or "medicine men" to agitate us either, as Jim Hill has stated. We understand why we do not want it just as well as he understands why he does want it, and it is simply a matter of dollars and cents. Under no circumstances can we be benefited by it.

The report that opposition is dying is not true, as far as this part of the State is concerned; in fact, the opposition is stronger than it ever was. The farmer is the joke again, as usual. We are not free traders, but we will be with a little more legislation like that proposed.

Very respectfully,

Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say I am a Republican and a protectionist. I have always believed that our great American market—the greatest in the world and the envy of the producers of all other countries—should be preserved for our own people, who live here, pay our taxes, support our Government, and who, in times of danger and trouble, shoulder their musket and give their lives in defense of its flag.

The manufacturers and the population of the cities, who earn their livelihood by trade and commerce that so largely depends upon manufacturers, are protected by tariff duties that are supposed to measure the difference in cost of labor at home and abroad. I have believed in that policy. Under it we have grown and prospered like no other nation on earth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

I have believed that Abraham Lincoln was right when, in discussing the theory of a protective tariff, he said:

When we send a dollar abroad for the purchase of an article the other fellow has the dollar and we have the goods. When we buy the same article made here at home, we have the goods and the dollar also.

But, Mr. President, I am not for protection in spots. I am not for this new doctrine, "this banner with a strange device," that will protect the iron industries of Pennsylvania, the shoe factories of Massachusetts, and the cotton mills of Georgia, and at the same time force the dairy farmer of Iowa, the wheat farmer of Minnesota, and the rancher in Montana to sell his products in a "free-trade" market, while purchasing all his supplies in a "protected" market.

You shall not by my vote write this unequal, unjust, and inequitable measure into the statutes of this Nation.

The whole scheme is fundamentally wrong, and no sophistry or argument can make it right.

This misnamed reciprocity measure seeks to put the farmer in a class by himself, separate and apart from the rest of the citizenship of our common country.

You are attempting to put the farmer in a "Jim Crow" car all by himself, while the rest of the industrial classes continue to ride in "Pullmans."

Mr. President, we might as well understand now that if this class legislation in tariff matters is to become a law the whole system of tariff will have to be rewritten.

Temporarily you may command a majority vote in this Senate Chamber by the present alliance of the Democratic Senators and a minority of the Republican Senators from the manufacturing States of the East, but the combination can not stand. If it does, the protective tariff system can not stand.

The prophetic words of Lincoln, uttered in regard to slavery in 1858, well apply to the present situation. He said then: "This country can not endure half slave and half free." No system of tariff, whether levied for protection or revenue, can endure that protects the industries of the manufacturing States and does not equally protect the industries of the agricultural States.

We are writing political history with the final passage of this bill.

Its enactment means the presence of new and strange faces in this historic Chamber in the near future.

If we are to revise tariff duties "to reduce the cost of living," why not commence revising the cotton and steel and chemical and leather schedules along with the agricultural schedule which Canadian reciprocity alone affects?

Why start in by revising the one schedule that has carried the lowest duties and affecting agricultural products which can not be controlled by trusts or combines?

Mr. President, I am well aware of the misinformation that exists widespread as to what this so-called reciprocity bill really means. I well know the power of the daily newspapers to create public opinion when they are united in a common cause. I know the pressure that has been brought to bear on individual Senators to vote for this bill.

I well know that in my own State powerful influences have been at work to create public opinion favorable to its passage. But no matter what may be the result, I would rather keep the respect of my own conscience and cast my vote on the pending measure in accord with my own honest judgment, at whatever cost to my own political fortunes, than be a party to the perpetration of so unjust a measure to the farmers of my State in common with the rest of this great Nation.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. STONE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rose simply for the purpose of reminding Senators of the particular effect of the division of my amendments. I do not care to do so now, if the Senator from Missouri desires to proceed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I had intended this afternoon to take some time in answering one or two questions that have been asked by some of the opponents of this bill, and then to ask one or two questions myself. I wanted to answer the question why I favored this reciprocity bill and why I oppose amendments to it, even though the amendments on their merits might have the approval of my judgment. I desired to answer both those questions; and then I intended to ask the opponents of the measure pending, or at least those of them who really believe in the wisdom and necessity of tariff reductions—that is, believe, or say they believe, in lowering the duties now prescribed by our tariff law—why they stand, as I think they do, in the way of taking up and considering that kind of legislation? We now have on the calendar several tariff-reduction bills sent over to us from the House, and there are others on the way. I am curious to know why Senators who believe in the substantial propositions embodied in those measures stand in the way of considering them.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I will ask unanimous consent to vote on both those bills before we adjourn next Monday. Will the Senator yield to me for that request?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not yield for that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri does not yield.

Mr. STONE. I do not yield to sidetrack or displace the bill now before the Senate with anything.

Mr. BAILEY. I will agree——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will stipulate that the agreement to vote on those two bills shall not in any way interfere with or displace the pending bill.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Texas will put his request for unanimous consent in this form, that we vote next Monday on the reciprocity bill and all amendments thereto during that legislative day, and on the following legislative day vote on the free-list bill, and on the following legislative day on the woolen schedule, I will join with him.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator complained that we were delaying the consideration of those two bills to reduce the tariff. I wanted to make it manifest to him and to the country that we were ready to consider and dispose of those bills without the least delay, and I will be glad to prefer a request for unanimous consent to vote on them. If the Senator thinks Monday is too much delay, I will make it to-morrow or the next day or the next, so as to make it clear that we are not delaying the consideration of those bills.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is always so adroit that he embarrasses his antagonist. Of course this proposal of his, made in such well-rounded terms, puts me at some disadvantage, and yet I do not recede a hair's breadth from the proposition that Senators are delaying the consideration of the tariff bills. To my good friends on the other side of this question, or some of them—not all, because there are many who intend to vote against the reciprocity bill who later will not vote to reduce tariff duties, but my friend from Texas will vote to reduce tariff duties and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has expressed himself in most eloquent and emphatic terms over again against the existing duties—to these and Senators like them I say that they are standing in the way, because they know and they admit—if not the two I have named, then others with whom they are acting have admitted more than once on the floor of the Senate—that they did not expect that the reciprocity bill would be postponed, sidetracked, or displaced, and that they expected it would pass the Senate without amendment, as it came from the House. That is their opinion, and there is not a Senator on that side who will express a contrary opinion, and the votes already taken justify that opinion. And yet, knowing this as they do, they come and offer amendment after amendment, with the certainty that the amendments will not be agreed to; and they debate them for hours and days and weeks. Whatever their purpose—and I do not impugn their motives or the sincerity of their course—the result is to postpone and imperil the consideration and passage of the tariff bills.

Mr. President, it is frightfully hot here this afternoon, and it is now nearly half past 4, and we have agreed to vote on the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and those offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to-day. I have concluded under the circumstances that I would postpone for to-day what I intended to say, believing that we will make greater progress and do better work if I do not occupy the time of the Senate by a speech which I can make to-morrow or the next day or the next. In other words, I am more anxious to vote than I am to speak. So I have determined not to enter to-day upon the discussion I have outlined or indicated. I would rather vote.

Before I sit down, however, I do want to notice one or two things entirely outside of what I had intended to say in the speech it was my purpose to deliver this afternoon.

My distinguished friend, the able junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] made a remark to-day while the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] occupied the floor that I attempted at the time to reply to, but others were recognized and I let it pass. Although it is now a little out of order, and although it is not of very great importance, I will recur to it simply that the truth of the situation, as I think it to be, may appear in the RECORD.

My friend from Texas remarked at some point during the speech of the Senator from North Carolina that the proposition now before the Senate proposed, among other things, to take the duty off wheat and make it free, when wheat was affording an annual revenue of $38,000 or more to the Treasury; that we were collecting that amount on wheat imported from Canada; that we proposed to wipe that out, and at the same time to continue a duty on lumber and timber in different forms, which the Senator correctly said produced a less aggregate of revenue than wheat. I think the Senator said less than half.

Mr. President, my friend makes a statement of fact, and upon that he predicates in a sentence or two an argument. I think the fact is not quite correctly stated, and if that be true, then the argument falls. So, if the argument be anything of moment, if it be worth anything, it falls, and it falls whether it is worth anything or not. It is true that during the last fiscal year the amount paid to the collectors of revenue of customs duties on Canadian imports of wheat was about $38,000—something over that—but, Mr. President, not a penny of it ever went permanently into the Treasury of the United States; not a penny of it was ever absorbed in the general funds of the Treasury; but every dollar of it, except the 1 per cent intended to cover the expense account, was remitted or returned, because the wheat was imported in bond.

Mr. BAILEY. They do not pay on wheat imported in bond.

Mr. STONE. Well, the duty was remitted.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Yes. I will say, however, to the Senator from Texas that the wheat was reexported.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a very different thing.

Mr. STONE. The effect is the same. I am not so happy in my expressions as is the Senator from Texas, and I am glad to have him call me down when I make a mistake.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Missouri is always accurate when he understands his subject, but the trouble in this case was that he did not have his facts exactly right.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I want to ask the Senator from Missouri where he ascertained that this 99 per cent of the collections on wheat was returned in the shape of drawbacks? If that is true, I have been incorrectly advised. I do not find any statement to that effect.

Mr. STONE. I have examined this document sent here by the President of the United States, showing the imports of wheat for the year ending June 30, 1910, showing the rate of duty levied and collected upon it; the number of bushels, 152,383; the value of it, $135,441; the customs duties levied, $38,096; and the amount of duties remitted by the United States, $38,096.

Mr. BAILEY. That states what we remit by this agreement and not what was paid out of the Treasury in the shape of drawbacks. If the Senator will examine that same column as to every article that is placed upon the free list, there is a statement of the amount of duty remitted.

Mr. STONE. I understand that.

Mr. BAILEY. But that has reference to remissions under this agreement and not under the drawback provisions of the present law.

Mr. STONE. I understand that thoroughly, but I also understand the fact to be that as to the wheat imported into this country from Canada for the mills at Minneapolis and elsewhere and ground into flour there and shipped abroad, the duties paid upon that were remitted or returned.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, is it not true that when wheat is shipped in bond the bond is given and the duty is not paid at all, excepting 1 per cent?

Mr. STONE. Oh, well, that shipped in bond simply passes through, but if it is shipped in here and ground and shipped out again——

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator will find that every dollar that has been set forth in the document accompanying this reciprocity agreement has been paid into the Treasury of the United States, not on the wheat that has been shipped in bond, but on the wheat that has been imported into the United States and has been consumed in the United States.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, let us get this right. I assume we all want to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course, Mr. President, if it is true that the Government paid out in drawbacks 99 per cent of what it collected on imported wheat, the document that the President sends to us would be misleading, and that the Senator from Missouri is mistaken in so assuming I think will appear by an examination of the very table which he has read, because I think he will find that the amount of duties remitted in that last table is identically the same as the amount of duties collected—not 99 per cent of it, but the full 100 per cent. If the Senator will further examine the statistics he will find that from all countries we imported something like 800,000 bushels of wheat, and that our total export of foreign imports was less than 150,000 bushels.

Mr. STONE. Can the Senator tell the Senate how much of the $38,000 of duty—which is a small and insignificant item in itself—remained in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. The whole of it, according to the official document.

Mr. STONE. I do not think so.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator would let me see that document just a moment——

Mr. STONE. Yes; the Senator can have it.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it will show what I have said, that the total remission is the full collection. Here it is. The Senator has marked it, and it is exactly as I supposed it to be. The total collections were $38,096; the duties to be remitted are $38,096.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator, I ask again, inform the Senate, in his opinion, whether the whole of that money was left in the Treasury?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly, according to that. The only statement I have ever seen—the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is now examining the documents to see if he can find the exports divided as to countries—the only statement I have ever seen is the total of imported wheat and the total export of the imported wheat. We reexported, I will say, something like 20 per cent; but we could not remit this $38,096 unless we actually collected it and retained it.

Mr. STONE. Well, Mr. President, I wanted to make that statement, which I think is a correct one; but now I will pass to the other subject in an equally brief manner, for I do not want to consume time, and see if my friend from Texas will join issue on this as he did on the other. During the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] the Senator from Texas made this observation:

> In order that the record may be complete and in order that the Senate and the country may understand with what great care this plank in the platform was drawn, I desire to incorporate in the RECORD the statement that when they commanded us immediately to put logs on the free list logs were then on the free list and had been for more than 20 years.

The particular clause of the platform referred to is in this language:

> We demand the immediate repeal of the tariff on wood pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs, and that those articles be placed upon the free list.

Mr. President, during the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill the Senator from Texas made a statement similar to the one I have just read. He and I had some little colloquy about it at that time, and I was a little surprised this morning that the Senator from Texas raised that question again. I thought he had been satisfied that he was wrong. Not often, and not without difficulty, can my friend be satisfied that he is wrong, but I did think that I had once even accomplished that; but it seems I did not do so.

Mr. President, the Denver convention was composed of capable and representative men, chosen from the different States. What my friend said here to-day, and said on a former occasion, impeaches the capacity of the committee on platform and of the convention, which agreed unanimously to the platform, to act with an intelligent comprehension of what they were attempting to do.

The committee on platform at Denver was composed of several Senators, Members of this body; some Members of the House of Representatives; governors and ex-governors; judges and ex-judges of high courts; and other prominent, influential, and intelligent men. Among them was our candidate for President in 1904, Alton B. Parker, who that year led our forces unhappily to defeat. I think, Mr. President—and I wish that matter settled permanently and finally—the gentlemen constituting that platform committee and those who composed the convention did know what they were doing. They were not acting ignorantly.

It is a fact that logs in the rough were then, as they are now, admitted free of duty; but there are other kinds of logs than those in the rough. The Senator's criticism hinges around logs, and nothing but logs. If a log with the bark on it undisturbed is brought in, it will come free; but if it is hewn on one side, if labor has been expended upon it in sawing or in hewing—that is the language of the statute—it will be subject to a duty. There might be loaded upon a car and shipped in a log 20 feet or more in length and of any diameter you please upon which human labor has been in some slight degree expended, it may be merely in hewing the sides of it for some reason, perhaps for convenience of shipping, or where some little sawing had been done upon it—that would be subject to duty. But it is a log, and the idea of the convention was to put logs of all kinds upon the free list.

Mr. President, my friend, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who addressed the Senate this afternoon, was one of the most influential members of the committee on platform at the Denver convention. He was not only a member of the convention, but he was a member of the platform committee. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], was not at the convention. He had been, as I recall, elected a delegate to the convention, but for some reason did not attend, and therefore we were deprived of his wide knowledge, experience, and advice.

Mr. BAILEY. I was sick.

Mr. STONE. We had to do the best we could under the circumstances, and with Judge Parker on the committee, who but recently had been our candidate for President, a distinguished lawyer and jurist and a great Democrat, and with several Members of this body and several Members of the House of Representatives, who had taken part in the passage of tariff laws more than once, on the committee, this clause was written into the platform, and properly written into the platform. So I wish again to enter my respectful protest, with all due deference to the weighty judgment of my friend the Senator from Texas that the platform was not absurd, was not ludicrous, and was not written in ignorance.

I think that is all I care to say, for I think that is enough.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it will take more than that to prove that the Senator from Texas is wrong in this instance. The Senator from Missouri is mistaken when he assumes that in any part of the dutiable list touching lumber logs are mentioned as being logs only so long as they are not beyond a certain state. I have been going hurriedly over the act itself, and, without having been able to read every line of it, I venture here to declare that the word "log" does not appear in the dutiable section of the act.

Mr. STONE. It does not, I think.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Senator's suggestion that logs, if manufactured beyond a certain point, were not logs within the meaning of the law hardly excuses that mistake.

I was, as the Senator has said, duly chosen a delegate to that convention, and while I hardly think these personal statements worth a place in the RECORD, since he has seen fit to call attention to the fact that I was not there, I will probably be permitted to state here the fact that I was lying at the point of death when that convention was in session, and that explains my absence.

The platform uses the word "logs," and the only place in the tariff act then in existence where the word "log" is used is in the free list; and surely if the convention or the committee did not conform its declaration to the state of the law, that is a fair ground for criticizing it for want of due deliberation.

Now, I did not mean to criticize the committee, because I have always understood—I do not state this as a matter within my own knowledge—that this plank was furnished to the committee on platform and adopted by it, and not drawn by it. The Senator from Missouri, I believe, was a member of that committee, and the zeal with which he has since defended that plank would lead me to suppose that if any member of the committee was responsible for it the Senator from Missouri had a part in framing it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. STONE. I had only this part in framing it, that I was a member of the platform committee. I do not at this moment recall just how that particular plank or paragraph of the platform came before the committee.

Now, I am perfectly willing to say to the Senator from Texas—there is no reason why I should not—that some suggestions—am I interrupting?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; go on.

Mr. STONE. That some suggestions on several of the more important questions pending were made in writing and brought to the convention and laid before the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. Now, you keep out. This is a Democratic affair.

Mr. STONE. They were brought to the committee and laid before the committee by a friend and fellow townsman of Mr. Bryan, who was nominated by the convention, and whom everybody knew would be nominated by the convention even before the convention met.

These suggestions came, as I said, from Mr. Bryan. Now, this particular paragraph may have been among those suggestions. I do not recall whether that is so. I myself had no conference or consultation with Mr. Bryan about it previous to the convention or after it, or at any time.

I will say also that Judge Parker laid before this platform committee, of which he was a member, a tentative draft of a platform, I think more extended and more in detail than the one that Mayor Brown, of Lincoln, brought in the way of suggestion from Mr. Bryan, and my friend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] also made some suggestions, and other members of the committee had planks, propositions, and resolutions.

That committee, I will say to my friend, was in session, I think, exceeding 48 hours—almost two days and nights—until the convention became impatient. We did not accept the mere deliverance of any man. We took what all had to say, and out of it all this platform, whether wise or unwise, was evolved.

I am only sorry, very sorry, that the illness of the Senator from Texas kept him from participating in the important work of making that platform. If he had been there, it is possible that the word "logs," under his rather hypercritical and ever-discriminating advice, might have been left out; but if so, we would still have been uncertain whether a log 20 or 30 feet long, that had the bark chipped off one side only, might or might not have been subject to duty.

I am very sorry the Senator from Texas could not have been there, but we did the best we could under the circumstances.

Mr. BAILEY. If I had attended that convention, I have a very well-defined idea that the platform would at least have read according to language of the law, and that we would not have demanded that a thing already on the free list should be immediately placed on it. I am perfectly sure that if any member of the committee had called attention to the fact that logs were on the free list—and that was not only true of the act of 1897, which was then the law, but it was true of the act of 1894, as it was of the act of 1890—that mistake would have been avoided.

Free logs is one of the bad examples of free raw material. The sturdy man who goes into the forest with an ax or a saw, on both of which he pays a duty, and cuts down the trees, is given no duty for his labor; but the moment that log is touched with a piece of machinery, by some magic change, under the law as it has stood for many years, it becomes entitled to a duty. I do not subscribe, sir, to that tariff philosophy, and probably it was my opposition to it which called my attention to a circumstance which might otherwise have escaped me, as it did the members of that committee on platform.

But, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that if I had been at that convention we would not have stopped with correcting the mistake as to logs. We would have eliminated the balance of that declaration from that platform, or else we would have had a contest over the motion to do so.

Sir, there were then 4,000 articles subject to a duty, and those 4,000 articles included all, or practically all, of the prime necessities of life, the duty on many of them exceeding 50 per cent and the duty on some exceeding 100 per cent; and as long as the law thus stood I would never have consented to select from those 4,000 dutiable articles, embracing every necessity of life, the four articles of wood pulp, print paper, lumber, and logs.

Sir, the duty of $2 per thousand then levied on lumber was only 12 per cent, and that small duty yielded to the Public Treasury more than $1,700,000 per annum, while the duty on cheap blankets was 180 per cent and yielded to the Public Treasury less than $180 per annum. The duty on the wool hats that men of moderate circumstances must buy was then, as it is now, more than 70 per cent, and yet it yielded to the Public Treasury less than a tenth of what lumber yielded at the moderate rate of 12 per cent.

Wood pulp and print paper bore a duty far below the average which the Senator from Missouri and I can ever hope to impose upon the imports to this country. For if you give us the power—and that we will be given the power if we behave ourselves with a moderate degree of common sense now seems certain—but when we have the power and we sit down at the table to frame a tariff bill, neither he nor I will be able to make its average rates as low as the duties on wood pulp and print paper were then. Wood pulp and print paper, sir, are used by two very small and very prosperous classes. Wood pulp is the raw material of the paper manufacturer, and we have it upon the authority of men whose testimony has not been impeached that the paper manufacturers are not only organized into a trust, but a greedy and a prosperous one. And yet will you tell me that this greedy and prosperous trust should have the small duty on the raw material remitted while the working men and women of this country are paying an average duty of 95 per cent upon their woolen goods?

Oh, no, Mr. President; no such proposition as that could have ever passed unchallenged in a body of which I was a member. The print paper is manufactured, as I say, by a trust; and if they are not a trust, how many paper manufacturers are there in this land? The number is so small that, according to all the testimony of those who patronize them, there is no substantial competition between them. Shall you remit the duty on wood pulp, and thus take from the public Treasury a million dollars toward the public expenses to save that moderate tax to these few rich and greedy paper manufacturers?

Mr. President, the case is no stronger in favor of free print paper. The representative of the American Newspaper Publishers appeared before the Committee on Finance while it held its hearings, and testified that this present duty of 10 per cent cost the newspaper publishers of the country $6,000,000 annually, and he claimed that a repeal of the duty would reduce the expense of printing these newspapers $6,000,000. He stated that there is one publisher in this country—the man who publishes the Hearst newspaper—uses one-tenth of this print paper, and therefore he would save $600,000 by the repeal of this duty.

Yet with an enormous tax upon the bread and meat, upon the shoes, hats, and clothing of the American people who must work for their daily bread, will you tell me why that tax is left on them while we repeal a 10 per cent tax upon a small and prosperous class? No, sir; the Senator from Missouri may well have said that had I been there there would have been a contest over that plank in our platform.

Mr. President, I was taught to believe that genuine Democracy looks to the millions and to their relief rather than to the hundreds who need no relief. It does not array class against class; it does not encourage the rich to oppress the poor, nor teach the poor to envy the rich. It enjoins upon every man to respect the rights of others. Its creed is justice to all men, but if it can do benevolence to some without doing injustice to any, it will bestow its favors, not upon those whose abundance gives them luxury and ease, but upon those whose hard estate condemns them to a never-ending toil, for its great mission in this world was and is—

> To lift some portion of that weight and care
> Which crushes into dumb despair
> One half of the human race.

And neither here nor elsewhere will I ever consent to repeal a 10 per cent tax upon a small, rich, and prosperous class while leaving a tax which averages more than 40 per cent upon the clothes, which for the sake of health, of comfort, and of decency, the poor are compelled to buy.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to further discuss the pending question, but only to remind Senators of its scope. It is sufficient to say that the division of the amendment upon which we are about to vote transfers flour and all the manufactured products of cereals from the reciprocal dutiable list in this arrangement to the free list, so far as the United States is concerned.

I yield to a temptation that is somewhat difficult to resist only sufficiently to say to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that he is quite in error in assuming that these amendments or this particular amendment is a rider to the reciprocity measure. He asked on Saturday—and he asked in a triumphant way, as though it were difficult of answer—why we had not courage enough to bring forward a bill for free flour, and not attach it as a rider to the reciprocity arrangement.

We have been told over and over again from the other side of the Chamber, and it has been assented to upon this side of the Chamber, that we have no chance now to secure free flour; that there is no opportunity at the present time, unless it is made a part of this bill, to give the people of the country free flour, free oatmeal, or free products of any sort coming from the farmers' cereals. If we do not transfer these articles from the reciprocal dutiable list to the free list, whatever advantage is to arise to the American people from free flour and free manufactured products of this sort must be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not mean to say that this advantage will never accrue to them. I only say that the time at which they may enjoy relief from taxation is indefinitely in the future.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say a moment ago that we could not get free flour and free oatmeal and free meal from Canada. Does the Senator mean by that that we can not pass a bill at this time for that purpose?

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean by that precisely what the Senator from Mississippi has declared over and over again, namely, that if free flour and other provisions of the tariff are incorporated into independent measures and pass the Congress of the United States they may not receive the approval of the President of the United States. I do not know whether they would or would not be approved, but it has been so asserted over and over again until we are proceeding upon the hypothesis that they would not be so approved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked my question for the purpose of getting information. If the Senator from Iowa believes that the legislation would be killed by being vetoed, then the Senator from Iowa can not hope that the same legislation ingrafted upon this bill would meet with any other fate. But if the Senator from Iowa entertains any doubt about the question as to whether a bill for free flour and free oatmeal and free meal and free dressed meat can pass this body or the body at the other end of the Capitol—I take it that there is no doubt about the latter—and then run the risk of a veto at the other end of the Avenue, I think I can assure him that if he can get as many as 7 votes from that side in favor of a bill to that effect as an original proposition we can furnish him with the balance on this side. We have to speculate upon a veto, it is true, but if we tack the two measures together we involve two things that we want in the speculation, and if we keep them separate we involve but one.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi, it seems to me, is guilty of a rare offense upon his part—bad reasoning, bad logic. There is just one thing of which we are absolutely sure, and it is the only thing of which we are sure so far as free flour is concerned, that if we transfer it in this arrangement from the reciprocal dutiable list to the free list, then it will become a law. No man dare assert that he has any doubt that that change in this measure will incur the Executive disapproval. I do not believe that any man dare say that or dare think that, having due respect for the wisdom and the patriotism of our Chief Executive.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With due respect to the wisdom and to the patriotism of the Chief Executive, but with possibly not as much respect as the Senator from Iowa would have me entertain for his early Federalistic, Republican, and protectionist education and training, I have my doubts, and it is because I have them that I do not want to involve Canadian reciprocity in the speculation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, one can not question, of course, the sincerity of the statement just made by the Senator from Mississippi. I am bound to respect it as being his real conviction. But it can not be the conviction of the great body of the Members of the Senate. We are here making a proposal to Canada, and it is for the Senate to make just the proposal that it thinks it is wise to make, having in view the welfare of our people. It is not a change that will imperil the arrangement in Canada; it will add to its attractiveness there; and it must, as it seems to me, meet the conscience and the approval of the people here.

But, Mr. President, I have already discussed this question at very great length and I will not pursue it further. I understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can simply remind Senators that the scope of this division is the transfer of flour and other such manufactured products from the dutiable list to the free list.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I was not here on Saturday when the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was voted upon. Had I been here, I should have voted against the amendment, and I propose to vote against the amendment now presented. Under no circumstances or condition am I going to join the low-tariff and free-trade raiders in an attempt to reform all the protection there is left out of the tariff in a haphazard and unskillful and undesirable way by these popgun political amendments.

I had some small and modest part in the formation of the Dingley bill. I heard prophecies most dire from our Democratic friends, some of whom I now see on the other side of the Chamber, that if we enacted the Dingley bill into law we would be unable to do any business with Europe.

The Bureau of Statistics report that the domestic exports from the United States to foreign countries for the present fiscal year ending June 30 amount to more than $2,000,000,000, the highest figure ever attained in the history of this Republic. I am well aware of the importance of our foreign trade. I have not been unmindful of its benefit to American labor.

Our foreign commerce will for the present year amount to more than $100 a second, $400,000 an hour, $4,000,000 a day for every day in the year, aggregating more than $2,000,000,000. It is a large sum; it is a desirable trade. Senators who were then Members of the House of Representatives, some of whom are within sound of my voice, have declared over and over again that that trade would be lost if we erected a tariff barrier around our territory.

Mr. President, it is a pleasure and a satisfaction to all of our countrymen to feel that the genius of our labor finds expression in such a high form that the people of every land pay tribute to it. But, sir, large as is our foreign commerce, important as it always has been, it is but a drop in the ocean of trade compared with that domestic commerce which our policy of protection has fostered and developed.

I desire to give special emphasis for a moment to the strength and value of that far greater commerce which does not bulk at the seaport, but can be seen in every hour of the day as it passes along the turnpike from the farm to the city or is whirled through space over the commercial highways of our country, extending through the States and Territories of the Union, giving employment to millions of skilled fingers and bringing cheer and happiness and luxury to the modest home of the artisan, the farmer, and the mechanic, amounting this very year to the almost incomprehensible sum of over $100,000 per minute, $6,000,000 per hour, over $140,000,000 a day, and amounting this year to more than $25,000,000,000. That is the market which permits the manufacturer to put an addition upon his factory. That is the market which urges the farmer to reclaim the waste land.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In just a moment. That is the market that makes our country independent of the world. That is the market that dignifies American labor. That is the market that insures the stable wage. That is the market which lights the home with happiness and fills it with good cheer.

Mr. President, in this half-hearted and desultory attack on our historic policy, conceived in anger and cast in a spirit of revenge, I do not propose to soil my hands by tearing down the wall built with practical unanimity by the Republican Party and whose fruits are visible on every hand as the result of sound economic wisdom.

Mr. President, there is not a country on the face of the globe to-day that is prosperous that has not emulated the American example and followed our policy and adopted our principles of protection. Even Canada, that has entered so largely into the political discussions of our affairs for the last few weeks, has a protective tariff policy equal to and in many respects higher than our own.

If steel rails were selling upon the Pittsburg market to-day for $28 a ton, and Mr. Gary should conceive it to be to the advantage of the Steel Co., rather than let the men out of the factory and keep his mills idle, to offer those surplus rails to the Montreal market at $20 a ton, the purchaser under that arrangement in Canada would be called upon by the Canadian Government to make good that $8 before he could be permitted to use the products of the American mill. With a jealousy that we may well emulate Canada protects her domestic market from foreign inundation, while we are battering down the wall of protection to-day in the interest of a mere fiction. Who is to say that even the advantage claimed for the newspaper owners will not fail? Does anybody imagine that free print paper is to come into this market cheaper than it can now be purchased here? I think not. Some of our mills may be closed but the owners will maintain the American price. A representative of one of the biggest paper mills in Canada called upon an important Michigan newspaper man within two weeks, and asked if he could do business with him. "Certainly," said the publisher, "but you will give us the benefit of the reduction of duty?" "No," said the Canadian, "I can not give you that benefit." "Well, you will give us one-half the reduction?" "No; I can not give you one-half." "You will give us one-third the reduction?" "No; I can not give you one-third. If Canadian reciprocity passes and the American duty is removed, we expect to market our product in your country at the American price." I think the newspaper publisher who waits to get cheaper paper from Canada will get a well-rounded, splendid-proportioned gold brick, and he deserves to get it for seeking such an unfair advantage at the expense of other lines of industry not as prosperous as his own.

For my part I do not propose by my vote to undertake to raze this tariff wall that means so much to our countrymen and to our country. I do not propose to identify myself with men who have never been in full sympathy with our protective policy. I want the wheels of American industry to turn; I want the light of American furnaces to shine; I want a domestic policy that has always made us prosperous.

The manufacturer or the tradesman who has no present market for his staples may store them for another month or year, but the laborer can not store his wares. His wares are the muscles of his strong right arm; his capital is his time; and he must sell it on the instant or never sell it at all. The old saying that the mill will never grind with the water that has passed must be cut from the list of aphorisms, for the wonderful progress of electrical science has enabled us to stand by the side of the cataract, gather the power of the falling water, store that power in the cells of the dynamo, send it across the ocean, and a year later turn a wheel with the force thus appropriated and preserved; but neither God nor man can stay the course of time. Time stands for the dial of the universe, and as the minutes are ticked off he gives them to those who grasp them. Our policy creates the opportunity to thus profitably use the passing minutes, and the enviable status of the American laboring man is the honest tribute to our wisdom and our fidelity.

Labor is so helpless it is the first to feel the effect of a reduction of value and the last to get the benefit of an inflation. A lower tariff will flood this market with imported goods, and down will fall the price of labor, as falls the mercury in a winter's morning.

Mr. President, I shall do nothing that will in any way impair the harmony and the effectiveness and the strength and the resistance of the wall of protection. I shall not do it in anger, and I shall not do it in a spirit of compromise or good will. I am for the American policy, which has made our country great and which is making every country great which has adopted it. I am for the American policy and opposed to free trade in whole or in spots, and if I ever vote to tear down this wall it will be when I am fully convinced that it does not subserve a useful purpose to my countrymen, and not in a spirit of political advantage or political revenge.

Therefore, Mr. President, had I been here on Saturday last I should have voted against the amendment then pending, and to-day I shall cast my vote against similar amendments and against every raid which is unfairly made against this principle—a principle which has put into the savings banks of our country more money than was ever put into banks by the people of any land. The 8,000,000 people of the State of New York alone have more money in such savings to their credit than there is in savings among the 44,000,000 people composing the British Empire. When you ask me to change that prosperous condition for one of doubt and anxiety and failure, I question your wisdom and will follow the inclinations of my own heart and the promptings of my own judgment.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, on last Saturday, when the vote was taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the bill, I voted in favor of the amendment. I did so because I thought it was meritorious and calculated for the benefit of the consumers of the country; and I think so still just as much as I did then; but the majority against the amendment was so large—and would have been larger if there had been a greater attendance of the Senate on that occasion—that I became convinced of the utter futility of attempting to ask the adoption of any amendment whatever to the Canadian reciprocity bill. I then determined that I should not vote at all on any further amendments to that bill. I would not be willing to vote against any that I thought were proper and meritorious, but I can not bring my consent to vote for them and be acting what I consider a part in a comedy.

I beg to assure the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that I am very far from meaning by this remark that their action in offering the amendments they have offered and trying to the best of their ability to support them before the Senate is a comedy to them—and this will apply to all other Senators who may hereafter wish to offer amendments. On the contrary, I assume that they consider it their duty to offer the amendments and to speak in their favor. I know that they are better judges of their duty than I am, and I believe they are better judges of their duty in these matters than any other Senator in this Chamber.

Therefore, for reasons that I have stated, I shall not vote hereafter on any amendment offered to the bill, with two exceptions. It is possible that the Democratic free-list bill may be offered as an amendment. If so, I shall consider it my duty to vote for it, with the full knowledge that it will be voted down by the Democratic Members of the Senate for reasons sufficient unto them; and I will vote for it also when it comes again before the Senate as an independent measure, with the full knowledge, which every other Senator here also has, that it will never become a law.

Another exception is this: It may be that some Senator may wish to offer amendments retaining the present duty or at least some duty on agricultural products of this country which this bill puts on the free list, and, as my whole opposition to it is on account of the fact that it takes the duty off of agricultural products without reducing the duties on manufactured products, I shall wish to go on record as voting for such an amendment, although with the full knowledge that it will share the fate of all other amendments.

I wish to make this statement in advance of the vote in order that my position may be understood and that no one will ever be able to say when I did not vote that I refrained from doing so because I wished to dodge any vote on any amendment; for while I have the honor to be a Member of the Senate I shall strive very hard never to give occasion to anyone to say that I have dodged any question that may come before it for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, without asking for the reading of the amendment, I simply request that the nature of the amendment may be briefly stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is to strike out all that part of the pending bill beginning with the word "tomatoes," on page 3 of the reprint, down to and including the words "cherry juice, and so forth, ad valorem," on page 4 of the reprint, and to insert all of the items on page 18 under the free list. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I had intended under his authority to transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. TERRELL], who is now necessarily absent. I am informed, however, by the political colleagues of the Senator from Maine that if he were present he would vote in the same way that I would vote and that my colleague would vote. Therefore I am unable to carry out the purpose to make any pair, and I am also free to vote by that fact, and I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is unavoidably detained. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TAYLOR (when Mr. LEA's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LEA] is absent from the city on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I therefore withhold my vote. I understand if the Senator from Mississippi were present, he would vote "nay." If at liberty, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I am informed that he would, if present, vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]; but I am informed that he would vote "nay" if he were present, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON (when Mr. TERRELL's name was called). Supplemental to the statement which I have already made, which explains the reason why my colleague is not paired, I simply wish to announce that, if he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. I am requested to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. If the Senator from New York were present, he would vote "nay," while the Senator from South Dakota would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent from the city. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bailey	Clapp	Gronna	Simmons
Borah	Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Warren
Bourne	Cummins	La Follette
Bristow	Dixon	Nelson

NAYS—52.

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. The next division which I ask of my amendment is as follows. Strike from line 19, on page 4, to and including line 9, page 5, of the committee print, and insert in the free list the following, found in italics on page 21 of the reprint showing my amendments. I read the items that I ask to be inserted:

Agricultural implements of all kinds, including portable engines with boilers in combination, and horsepower or traction engines for farm purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question just for information.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. While the Senator is putting agricultural implements, including portable engines, on the free list, why has he left off cotton gins?

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not hear the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say, while you are putting agricultural implements of every sort, including farm engines, on the free list, why was it that cotton gins were not also placed in the list?

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not cotton gins in my mind. That is all. I am perfectly willing to put them in. Will the Senator from Mississippi vote for the amendment if I put them in?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not; but I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I will leave the Senator from Mississippi to take care of the cotton gins.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator a question for this reason: If he offers these same amendments later on to some other bill, or as an independent proposition, I should like to suggest to him that the cotton farmer also uses implements, and the cotton gin is one of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not very familiar, of course, with the cotton gin——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, I will vote for it as an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not live in that quarter of the country. I wish I was more familiar with them, but I have used such generic terms here as must include everything that a farmer uses to produce his crop.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not so understand it because the Senator thought it was necessary to include portable farm engines eo nomine.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I included them because——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that be the case, and a harvester for grain——

Mr. CUMMINS. It can hardly be said that a portable engine or a traction engine is a farm implement. It can be used for a great many other purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a certain sense, a cotton gin might not be an implement, but it is one of the things used by the cotton farmer in order to get his crop ready for market.

Mr. CUMMINS. From what little I know of the cotton gin, I think it is an agricultural implement, and would be included within this very broad and general language which I have employed, namely "agricultural implements of all kinds, including portable engines with boilers in combination, and horsepower or traction engines for farm purposes."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Later on when the Senator from Iowa and I vote together, upon some occasion when it does not involve in its fate something else, I hope he will add the things which the cotton farmers use as well as those which the grain farmers use.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that this is simply a motion to strike out; not a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary has not the part to be inserted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read it again: Strike out from line 19, on page 4, to and including line 9, on page 5, in the committee print and insert in the free list the following, found in italics on page 21 of the reprint showing my amendments. What is there found I read:

Agricultural implements of all kinds, including portable engines with boilers in combination, and horsepower or traction engines for farm purposes.

This simply transfers agricultural implements, which remain in this arrangement under heavy duties, from the dutiable list to the free list, so that the farmer, if conditions of trade permit it, may be able to raise his untaxed crops with untaxed agricultural implements.

Upon the motion I ask for the yeas and nays, and I want to say that I am not going to tax the patience of the Senate by asking for the yeas and nays upon the great list that I have here. I want to get a fair consensus of opinion upon the several phases of my amendments, and then I do not intend to ask any further yea-and-nay votes, whatever others may want to do. But it seems to me upon agricultural implements, because the relation between them and the agricultural crop is so close, we ought to record ourselves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon this amendment the Senator from Iowa requests the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again I make the same announcement with reference to the Senator from Maine, my colleague, and myself, and I will let the announcement stand as to any future calls of the yeas and nays. I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when the name of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was called). I wish to announce again that the Senator from Arkansas has a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote. I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my general pair.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I understand, also, he would vote "nay" upon this proposition, and I should vote "yea." I therefore ask leave to withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I again make the same announcement for the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] with reference to his pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. If the Senator from New York were present, he would vote "nay" and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). I make the same announcement as on the last vote. My colleague is absent from the city. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and as I am authorized to vote, as he would vote the same as I do, I will vote. I vote "nay." I will let this announcement stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I will let this announcement stand for any further votes which may be taken to-day without repeating it.

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and he has authorized me to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAGE. I again announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TAYLOR. My colleague [Mr. LEA] is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bailey	Clapp	Gronna	Nelson
Bourne	Cummins	Kenyon	Simmons
Bristow	Dixon	La Follette	Warren

NAYS—52.

Bacon	du Pont	McLean	Reed

NOT VOTING—27.

Bankhead	Dillingham	Newlands	Stephenson
Borah	Frye	O'Gorman	Stone
Bradley	Gamble	Paynter	Sutherland
Clarke, Ark.	Guggenheim	Percy	Terrell
Crawford	Lea	Rayner	Thornton
Culberson	Lorimer	Richardson	Tillman
Davis	McCumber	Smith, Md.

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the second division on which I ask a vote is as follows: Strike out from line 23, page 5, to line 23, page 6, both inclusive, of the committee print, and insert in the free list from line 6 to 23, page 22, both inclusive, in italics in the reprint showing my amendments.

This is a transfer from the dutiable list of certain articles, such as asbestos and cutlery and bells and clocks and printer's wooden cases, and so on. I need not recite the articles in detail. I do not intend to ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon this division of my amendments. I believe the transfer ought to be made, but evidently a majority of the Senate are of a contrary opinion. Therefore, I simply submit the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. The next division of my amendment is as follows: Strike out lines 11 to 13, inclusive, page 7, committee print, and insert in the free list, lines 1 to 5, both inclusive, page 22, reprint showing my amendments.

The effect of this division is to transfer motor vehicles and automobiles and parts thereof, including rubber tires, to the free list. In this arrangement with Canada it is apparent the duty on rubber tires is very carefully preserved, as is also the duty on automobiles. Under our present law the duty is 35 per cent. We have very generously and munificently granted to Canada a reduction of 5 per cent. The amendment which I propose to insert in the free list is as follows:

> Automobiles, and parts thereof, including rubber tires; motor vehicles of all kinds, and parts thereof, and rubber tires therefor; crude rubber; manufactured rubber, which shall include all articles of which rubber is the component part of chief value.

I take it for granted, however, that the majority of the Senate does not regard it as desirable, and unless some other Member of the Senate desires the yeas and nays upon the amendment I shall not ask for a vote by yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I wish to remark in this connection that this treaty, which is dealing so generously with the manufacturers of the United States and so harshly with the farmers, carefully prescribes that the duty shall not be reduced upon rubber tires, preserving the full duty on a trust-controlled product specifically and definitely; and the Senate does not care to go upon record upon the vote for the approval or disapproval of the proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. The next division on which I desire a vote is as follows: Strike out from line 24, page 7, to line 12, page 8, both inclusive, committee print, and insert in the free list the paragraph in italics lines 20 to 23, both inclusive, page 19 of the reprint showing my amendments.

Mr. President, this relates to the lumber schedule. It takes lumber from the dutiable list and puts it upon the free list so far as the United States is concerned. It is true there is some reduction in the arrangement, but the free part of the arrangement is upon that kind of lumber which is not to any great extent imported into the United States. The lumber schedule has been the subject of very extensive discussion, not now, but at a former time. I can not imagine why we should not have free lumber if we are to have free wheat and free cattle. I would like the yeas and nays upon the free-lumber schedule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Under the same announcement as was made heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], and vote "nay." I make this announcement to stand on subsequent votes that may be taken to-day.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." My pair not being present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is absent, and is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. LEA] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

Mr. BACON. I again announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. If the Senator from New York were present, he would vote "nay" and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "yea."

The result was announced, yeas 12, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bailey	Brown	Dixon	La Follette
Bourne	Clapp	Gronna	Nelson
Bristow	Cummins	Kenyon	Simmons

NAYS—52.

Bacon	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Root

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say, for the encouragement of Senators, that I intend to ask for but one more roll call. I present the amendments in the divisions under which I think they would naturally group.

The next is to strike out lines 19 and 20, both inclusive, page 8, of the committee print; and on page 15, lines 21 to 23, inclusive, of the committee print, and to insert in the free list what is in italics on page 21 of the reprint showing my amendments—

> Coal of all kinds, screened or unscreened.

This is simply to put upon our free list coal from Canada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. The next division is to strike out lines 13 to 18, inclusive, page 8, committee print, and lines 1 to 7, inclusive, page 19, and insert in the free list from and beginning with the words "iron ore" in line 22, page 20, to and including line 6, page 21, of the reprint showing my amendments. This is to transfer to the free list iron ore and all the so-called tonnage products of iron and steel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to make it certain. It is somewhat complicated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8 of the bill strike out all of lines 13 to 18, inclusive; on page 19, beginning with line 1, strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive; and on page 20, line 22, beginning with the words "iron ore," insert the remainder of that paragraph in the free list to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. The next division is, to add to the free list, after line 14, page 19, of the committee print, the paragraph in italics in lines 24 and 25, page 22, of the reprint of my amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 19 of the bill, after line 14, insert the following:

Leather and all manufactures thereof, including all manufactures of which leather is a component part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Next I add immediately thereafter the paragraph shown in italics, lines 4 to 6, inclusive, page 23, of the reprint showing my amendments.

The SECRETARY. Insert in the free list the words:

Cotton cloth, threads and fabrics of all kinds, and the manufactures thereof, including all manufactures of which cotton is a component part.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Next I add immediately thereafter the paragraph shown in italics, lines 7 to 9, inclusive, on page 23.

The SECRETARY. Insert in the free list the following paragraph:

Silk cloth, threads and fabrics of all kinds, and the manufactures thereof, including all manufactures of which silk is a component part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President, I have an amendment upon which I intend to ask for the yeas and nays, and I earnestly hope that the determination which appears so fixed here not to amend the bill in any respect whatsoever will be abandoned for the moment.

I propose an amendment which has nothing whatsoever to do with duties. It is very plain that you do not intend to change the duties on manufactured products on either side of the Chamber. I pass that and accept it for the time being as fixed, but I have prepared and I have offered an amendment to the proviso which states the conditions under which our act shall become effective.

You will remember that in discussing this matter the other day I said that one of the serious defects of the bill was that the concessions upon the part of the United States do not cease when the concessions upon the part of Canada may cease. That is to say, Canada may withdraw every consideration which she extends to us for that which we are now giving her and our law remains as we now enact it. I do not believe that the like of this provision can be found in the annals of civilized nations.

I believe, first, that we are dangerously near a collision with the favored-nation clause in extending these concessions beyond the time when we receive concessions from Canada; in other words, making our concessions dependent upon the existence and continuance of concessions from Canada. Is there a Senator here who, in view of this as a reciprocal arrangement and not merely as a reduction of our duties, does not believe that if we are to make a trade with Canada when her consideration fails our concessions will also cease? There is not a Senator here who does not so think; and I must believe that it was an oversight upon the part of those who framed the bill.

I am very glad, for my respect for the Senate, that the bill was not drawn by a Member of this body. If it was, and the Member who drew the bill was here, I am sure he would be the first to concede this weakness of it. Now, mark what I propose in order to work out——

Mr. SIMMONS. I presume the Senator is equally glad that it was not drawn by a Member of the other body.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know who drew the bill; I have not the information; but I am sure that it was not drawn by a Member of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In response to what was said by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], it is my understanding that the bill was drawn by a Member of the other body, and by no less a Member than the present minority leader, who was then a member of the Republican majority.

Mr. SIMMONS. It might have been copied, but I doubt very much whether it was drawn by him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not permit myself to inquire into those things. I do not know who drew the bill. Whoever drew it, of course, did his duty as he saw it. But the fact is, as I have stated, that if Canada in a month or two months or a year shall change her concession by parliamentary enactment our law continues as we now enact it until Congress, as I once before remarked, always slow and sometimes uncertain, shall change what we now do. Therefore I have proposed this amendment:

Provided further, That if at any time after said proclamation shall be issued the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence that the facts upon which the original proclamation was issued no longer exist—

That is to say, that Canada is admitting our goods upon these rates of duty or without duty, as the case may be—

he shall then make proclamation to that effect, and the articles hereinbefore specified to be admitted to the United States exempt from duty shall be subject to such duties as the general tariff law of the United States shall then prescribe for such articles.

The articles upon which the duties are reduced are so immaterial that they are negligible quantities, and I pay no attention to them at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator read his amendment again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Iowa state for the information of the Secretary at what point he proposes that his amendment shall be inserted?

Mr. CUMMINS. My amendment is to strike out the proviso from line 13 to line 23, inclusive, on page 19 of the committee print, and insert in lieu thereof the paragraphs in italics from line 19, on page 23, to line 7, on page 25, inclusive, of the reprint showing my amendments. The first two paragraphs of the proviso are the same, substantially, as are found in the present bill. I have read the first change which I propose. I will read it again, so that the Senate may understand just what it is:

Provided further, That if at any time after said proclamation shall be issued—

That is, when Canada acts upon this and the President has evidence that our goods are being admitted into Canada under this arrangement, he issues a proclamation, and thereafter the goods from Canada come in as provided in the bill.

Provided further, That if at any time after said proclamation shall be issued the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence that the facts upon which the original proclamation was issued no longer exist, he shall then make proclamation to that effect, and the articles hereinbefore specified to be admitted to the United States exempt from duty shall be subject to such duties as the general tariff law of the United States shall then prescribe for such articles.

I may say to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] that this proviso is the one attached to the free list. There is a similar one, or there ought to be a similar one, attached to the dutiable list, although I have not offered any amendment in that regard.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator's amendment now applies only to articles on the free list?

Mr. CUMMINS. The proviso that I am seeking to amend is the proviso attached to the free list and not the proviso attached to the dutiable list.

Mr. SIMMONS. Are we to have a proviso that applies to the dutiable list also?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not offered one, but, of course, if it shall be found to be the belief of the Senate that some such arrangement as this ought to be made, it can very easily be attached to the dutiable list, as we now will attach it, I hope, to the free list.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why could not the Senator include in his proviso articles covered by the dutiable list as well as those covered by the free list?

Mr. CUMMINS. I could.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why can he not do it now?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina will remember that this proviso occurs twice in the bill, first, is the dutiable list, and then comes the proviso upon which it goes into effect; then comes the free list and the proviso upon which it goes into effect. I have sought to amend only the proviso as to the free list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, the Senator's proviso makes it so that if the President made a mistake in his first proclamation he might recall it by a second.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would think not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, the effect would be that if after he had made proclamation he should later discover that the facts upon which he based it were wrong he could then issue another proclamation doing away with the previous proclamation; and the suggestion that I rose to make to the Senator from Iowa—and I will make it in an interrogative form—is whether he would not think it well to go still further and provide if the President found he had made a mistake in his second proclamation he might correct that by a third?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, I know that the Senator from Mississippi refuses to look upon any suggestion of change as serious, but the suggestion just made is hardly worthy of his high abilities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I assure the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will understand that I am offering this amendment because I believe it will cure a defect in the arrangement, and the suggestion indicates to me that the Senator from Mississippi did not hear me when I read the proviso.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think I heard it, and if I heard it correctly the amendment is based upon the idea that the President might issue a first proclamation upon misinformation as to what Canada had done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. Of course I knew the Senator had not——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if that were the case, my suggestion merely was that he might go on correcting errors to the end of the chapter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the Senator's imagination carries him to undue length. Will the Senator listen to me while I repeat the proviso, for which he is about to vote in the original arrangement, which he thinks, evidently, ought not to be changed in any form whatsoever?

Provided, That the articles above enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, shall be exempt from duty when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that the following articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila) are admitted into the Dominion of Canada free of duty.

I stated that if next week or next month Canada were to admit these articles free of duty and the President were to make a proclamation to that effect thereupon the same list of articles would enter the United States free from Canada; that if the month after that or the year after that Canada should repeal her enactment in that respect and levy duties upon the articles which she had before admitted free the President of the United States ought to have the power to take cognizance of that change of condition and issue a proclamation to that effect; and that thereafter the articles which are here enumerated should bear duties according to our general tariff law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I frankly admit that I did not understand——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I misunderstood the Senator from Iowa; but now does it not seem to the Senator from Iowa that if Canada's part of the contract once performed is to be repealed by an act of the Canadian national legislature, we might well trust our own National Legislature to repeal our part of it instead of intrusting it to the President?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all, Mr. President. Again the Senator from Mississippi fails to comprehend the situation. We could repeal our part of it any day. If we do, Canada's part ought to fail immediately. Canada can repeal her enactment at any time, and, if she does, our consideration ought to fail, and the articles on which we grant concessions ought to be ipso facto dutiable, instead of being upon the free list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that it does not necessarily follow that the Congress of the United States will want to repeal the reduction of duties upon Canadian products into the United States which had benefited the people of the United States, even if the Canadian Parliament had done a detriment to its people by repealing the act which had reduced taxes upon them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that it could be very wisely and safely left to the national legislative body of the United States to determine whether or not they did want to do that when the contingency should arise.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought, Mr. President, before we had reached the end of the discussion on this paragraph that the true attitude of Senators who are for this arrangement would appear. I simply wanted to make it absolutely sure that Senators upon the other side and that Senators upon this side are not supporting this arrangement because there is any reciprocity in it, because there are any concessions in it, because it is a true bargain between this country and Canada; but those Senators who intend to vote for it intend to vote for it simply because it is a reduction in the duties.

Mr. BAILEY. On agricultural products.

Mr. CUMMINS. On agricultural products; and you might just as well now stand up before the American people and say that you are voting for this because the duties on agricultural products are removed and not because you expect anything valuable coming from Canada on account of that removal; and the Senators upon this side who intend to vote for it intend to vote for it because they believe that in some way—I do not now know how, whether by alliance with the other side or what; I can not tell; I will not predict—but in some way they can secure immunity for their high duties upon manufactured products and their profits that are already overgrown and excessive. I just wanted the whole world to know that we were not looking for anything from Canada and that we were simply engaged in removing the duties from one class of the American people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Judging from the course of the ratiocinations upon the part of the Senator from Iowa and by my acquaintance with him in the past, I judge that to-morrow, when he reads that reply to what I have said, he will come to the conclusion that it was neither impartial nor altogether a fair exposition of it. It proceeds upon the idea that a man can have but one reason for doing what he does. We happen to have two. First, we want to reduce these duties; and, secondly, we want Canada to reduce duties upon our products. I am merely speaking for myself. I hope that even if Canada fails in relieving her people of taxation, we will not repeal so much of the act as will relieve ours from taxation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, coupled with the——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, permit me to suggest to the Senator from Iowa this idea: Under the provision which he offered, if Canada should change the state of facts as to any one item, then it would be obligatory and mandatory upon the President of the United States to issue a proclamation putting that item upon the dutiable list, as the law provided before this arrangement was entered into. Now, might it not be true that the arrangement would be agreeable to us and advantageous to us in spite of the fact that some item on the list——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or half a dozen items.

Mr. FLETCHER. Or half a dozen items, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, might have been changed in relation to the facts connected with them?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can easily conceive that the conditions stated by the Senator from Florida might exist; but if we are granting these concessions to Canada in consideration of concessions granted by her to us, if it is a bargain and exchange, then, when the consideration fails, our promise ought to fail. If Congress wants at that time to put any article upon the free list that would be by such proclamation restored to the dutiable list, it could do so. It has always in charge and under its control the adjustment of tariff laws.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GORE. I would like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the Canadian bill—I have forgotten for the present moment—has a provision such as he proposes here?

Mr. CUMMINS. It has not.

Mr. GORE. I did not think it had.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has not, as I remember it.

Mr. GORE. That was my recollection, but I was not sure about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say, in passing, that the Canadian bill is a mere resolution; it is an outline; it is a suggestion; but it does protect Canada very much more thoroughly than this bill protects the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have not finished.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, I will ask the Senator's courtesy for a moment. I had not intended to participate at all in the consideration of these amendments.

The Senator from Iowa is undoubtedly correct in his statement as to the defect in this bill. It provides that the President may create a condition upon the happening of certain things, but it makes no provision for him to restore the condition upon the failure of those things. That is true both as to dutiable articles and as to the free list. Now, I can not believe for a minute that it was the intention of the framers of the bill that that condition should exist; but it does exist under the terms of this bill. The language that relates to the dutiable list is practically the same as that to which the Senator from Iowa has called attention. It reads:

Provided, That the duties above enumerated shall take effect whenever the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that on the articles hereinafter enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), when imported therefrom into the Dominion of Canada, duties not in excess of the following are imposed.

That is an unqualified statement. The President makes the proclamation. Now, Canada and the United States are both free to change or to repeal this legislation. If Canada were to repeal it, we will say after the adjournment of Congress, at the end of any session, then the Congress would not be in session, and Canada having repealed the law, it would still have the benefit of free access to our market in the case of the free list or of preferential rights under the dutiable list. No authority is given the President to restore our tariff on the conditions either relating to the free list or the dutiable list. It must await the action of Congress. Suppose, for instance—and I am appealing now to the Republicans; I am appealing now to protectionists—suppose, for instance, that the Congress of the United States should be Democratic, should be free trade, then they would not repeal the law. It would take months, it would take more than a long session of Congress or a special session of Congress to get action that would restore the duties or that would restore the status of our commerce, and this might go on for years; the condition might exist for years that we would receive no rights in Canada, and Canada would continue to receive all the benefits of the reduction in duties on the free list.

There is not only a great deal of merit in the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, but it points out the actual necessity of amending the provisions of this bill so that in the event that Canada should repeal the legislation which she is supposed to enact the Government of the United States would have a speedy and prompt remedy at hand to be exercised through a proclamation of the President of the United States, and that the United States would not be at the mercy of the differences of opinion in a long drawn-out contest which would follow, in which every item on the free list and dutiable list would have to be considered and contended about in Congress, just as we have been doing for months on this occasion. Some Senators would say "Yes; so far, let us repair the evil; so far, let us restore the status"; and others would say, "Let us do it as to this schedule, but not as to that"; and we would have one of those interminable tariff contests on hand.

Are we going to walk up against that, Republican Senators, who believe in a protective tariff policy? Are we going to put ourselves into such a position merely in response to a sentiment or promise that this bill shall not be changed in any particular? Are we going to leave our Government without the power to meet the changed conditions which are brought about or may be brought about by a change of administration in the Canadian Government or here? Are we going to tie our hands and leave the hands of the other Government free? I think it is time to pause, and I am compelled to deviate from the course I have laid down for myself here of remaining silent and voting against amendments.

This is an amendment that is imperative. It is imperative to Republicans. It is imperative to Democrats who believe in a protective tariff even so far as it is conceded by some Senators who have spoken to-day——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I would ask either Senator, as they are in accord upon the proposition, if, conceding that all that is said by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Idaho upon this subject——

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I say, conceding all the Senator from Iowa says and all the Senator from Idaho says as to the correct construction of this section as it is found in this bill, does not the apprehension of an evil result flowing from that necessarily rest upon an assumption of a purpose or the possibility that Canada would act in bad faith and attempt to perpetrate a fraud upon the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. May I answer?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no apprehension of bad faith on the part of Canada. It is expressly stated in the correspondence that either Government may change its tariff laws at any time, whether immediately or remotely. There would be no bad faith upon the part of Canada in changing her tariff laws in a month if she found it for her interest to do so. There would be no bad faith upon the part of the United States in changing the tariff laws that we now have at the next session if we cared to do so.

Mr. BACON. I do not agree with the Senator in that regard. It is true that that provision is in there, but this is a reciprocal arrangement, and if Canada should purposely change her arrangements in order that she might have the benefit of the arrangement and deny to us the benefit of the reciprocal advantage, it would certainly be a fraud.

Mr. CUMMINS. Canada would do so, if I may be permitted to answer, upon the hypothesis that the Congress of the United States would immediately or as soon as it could withdraw the consideration which we had given to Canada.

Mr. BACON. While that is true, it is not to be assumed that Canada would undertake any measure of that kind which would affect the reciprocal advantages without the proper communication of its intention so to do to the United States, or to give the opportunity to the United States to make the same arrangement for themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. In all the arrangements with nations, which usually take the form of a treaty, I never have known one which continued to be binding upon one nation after it had ceased to be binding upon the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. But it is for the purpose——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield?

Mr HEYBURN. I understood the Senator from Iowa had yielded the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. We must bear in mind that while frequently an arrangement is referred to as a treaty it is not a treaty. If it were a treaty, it would require concurrent action upon the part of the two nations to effect it. But it is merely legislation sentimentalized as a treaty. It is legislation as any other tariff bill is legislation.

Now, the Senator from Georgia, as I understood him, suggests that this was not probable. The parties in Canada to-day are so nearly divided on this question that they do not dare to come to a vote, and in 12 months from now the Canadian Parliament may be in the hands of that element of the political parties of that country which is strongly opposed to this arrangement; and we may be facing a repeal of it within a year. There is no assurance whatever that the Canadian Government will continue this tariff arrangement, and the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa—which, by the way, I presume he would intend to incorporate on page 9 in the corresponding provisions with reference to the dutiable list——

Mr. CUMMINS. It evidently ought to be in there.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it should be; it is as necessary in one case as in the other. The amendment is intended to give the Government of the United States the right to restore the condition——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When the contract fails.

Mr. HEYBURN. When the contract fails, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Michigan—when the contract fails that this Government should have an immediate right to restore the conditions and not be compelled to wait and run the gantlet of legislation, as it would be compelled to do in the absence of an amendment of these two provisions in the bill, because no one will contend that the President can issue a proclamation affecting the tariffs except he is authorized specifically by Congress to do it.

The President has no original power at all over this question. The tariff schedules can be dealt with only by Congress, and I have suggested before the condition, and I emphasize it, that Congress either might not be in session for many months, as is, of course, frequently the case, or if in session, the controversies which would arise over the restoration of these several schedules might occupy the time of Congress for months, or for years, for that matter. It might be years before the Congress of the United States would be so constituted that the principle of protection would be again restored and applied to the Government.

I am sure that Republican Senators can separate the consideration of this amendment from those questions which have been voted upon to-day. It is not in the same class. It is for the protection of the principle. It is to provide for the manner and to provide the power to restore the conditions in the event of that which not only may happen, but which probably will happen.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say that I consider the suggestion of danger to flow from this peculiar phraseology to be one not of a practical character. If there were a formal treaty between the two countries, as the Senator from Idaho has suggested there is not in this case, if there were an international treaty the two countries would proceed upon the assumption that each nation would act in good faith to the other nation, and that neither nation would seek to secure an advantage by any technical construction of any part of a treaty to which it was not legitimately entitled, and that if there were reciprocal advantages no nation could in honor nor would attempt to secure to itself an advantage under that arrangement at a time when it denied the same advantage to the other by taking advantage of the opportunity to withdraw its consent or by any other means.

While this is not a treaty, but reciprocal legislation, it is entered into with the purpose on the part of each to give the other an advantage in consideration of an advantage which it receives itself, and it is not to be conceived that either would, by taking advantage of the opportunity of the right given to change its tariff laws—and we certainly have no right to act upon the assumption that either nation would by taking advantage of any opportunity of that kind or right of that kind—endeavor to secure to itself an advantage under this reciprocal relation, which it thus took the opportunity to deprive the other of in a reciprocal way.

I do not conceive it possible that Canada should at any time desire to take advantage of the opportunity to change her tariff laws, and if the changing of those tariff laws would, in effect, cause her people to be the recipients of advantages which had been given in consideration of those laws as they then existed, I have not a shadow of doubt that the Government of the United States would have due notice of it, so that any reciprocal advantage which we might lose on account of those changes in the laws should be so cared for that we would not in fact be put at a disadvantage.

I repeat that the whole suggestion assumes that there will be an act of bad faith in order to accomplish or bring about that result, because to bring about that result in that way, while it might be done in pursuance of a plain privilege granted in the legislation, there would be necessary an act of bad faith and a fraud on the part of Canada against the United States.

I do not assume that that will ever be attempted by any country with which we have these negotiations either by formal treaty or by reciprocal legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask the Senator from Georgia if this so-called agreement, or what the President frequently calls a treaty, is ever terminated, must it not be done by the action of one or the other Governments?

Mr. BACON. I suppose undoubtedly that it would be an action not in the manner of taking an undue advantage of the other, but it would be done by proper notice.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think it could be arranged so that we would have concurrent action? Of course we know that if a treaty is denounced, that ends it.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If one of the parties denounces a treaty that ends the treaty.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. But in this case we can only protect ourselves by having the power to abrogate this agreement when the other party abrogates it, so far as that country is concerned.

Mr. BACON. I think we would be protected by the good faith which we have every reason to repose in the other Government, in its rectitude of conduct, in its rectitude of purpose. It is true this reciprocal legislation is of an unusual character and it is different from the case of a treaty, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, in the fact that a treaty would be ended by a denunciation, and, in the case of reciprocal legislation, it must be ended by legislation in each country.

I have no apprehension on my part that if either the United States should desire to end it or Canada should desire to end it that ending would be brought about by the country desiring to end it communicating to the other country "We propose to annul this legislation; to repeal this legislation."

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Who would give Canada notice that the Congress of the United States intended to change the law?

Mr. BACON. I suppose Congress would be animated by an equal desire and purpose to act in good faith.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope when the Senator asks me a question he will permit me to answer it. I had not finished the answer to the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Proceed.

Mr. BACON. I was going to say that the question of the Senator from Iowa, as I understand it, is this: Who would give to Canada notice on the part of Congress of an intention to repeal the law? And I was replying that I assumed for ourselves the same purpose to act in good faith that I accord to Canada, and that I should suppose that if Congress intended to repeal this legislation, it would by proper resolution invest the Executive with the power to communicate to Canada that information, in order that Canada might take proper action at the same time and not be placed at a disadvantage by our repeal of that legislation. That is one practical way in which it could be done. Or, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] suggests to me, Congress could pass the bill to take effect at a future date, which would give to Canada the opportunity in the meantime to pass a bill so that it would not be a one-sided arrangement with the reciprocal advantage lost to one while the advantage was retained to the other.

It might have been better that the bill should have been framed in reference to the possibility of such action on the part of Canada. But I am very free to say that if I myself had been drawing the bill I would not have considered the possibility of the fraudulent—and you might say dishonest—purpose of the Canadian Government to be such as to warrant the recognition of it by putting a safeguard against it in the bill, because I do not think that there is to be entertained for a moment the assumption that there will be on the part of Canada or on the part of the United States any act of bad faith in regard to this matter.

When we enact reciprocal legislation, the high impulse of honor and good faith requires that we shall only enjoy the reciprocal advantage by according and assuring to the other side the corresponding advantage, and whenever we seek to take away the advantage from the other party we will do so in such a manner as at the same time to surrender that which we have received in consideration of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The argument of the Senator from Georgia impresses me very strongly, but the argument intensifies my conviction that this amendment ought to be made. I have not suggested any bad faith on the part of Canada or on the part of the United States.

I recognize that the laws which repeal this statute in Canada and in the United States might be made to take effect at the same time; but let us look at it as a practical matter. Suppose next winter we wanted to change our tariff law with Canada. Suppose that our Democratic friends, in revising the tariff generally, came to the conclusion that they did not want this patchwork to be upon their completed garment, and therefore did not want a special arrangement with Canada, I do not believe it would be bad faith upon the part of the United States or upon the part of Congress to pass a law revising our tariff which would include Canada and which would repeal this act.

But he would be a wise man who would be able to notify Canada that Congress would at a certain time perform a particular act. I do not believe it is possible for the wit of man to predict that at a certain time Congress will pass a law repealing an existing statute.

I do recognize that the last suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia is entirely practical, namely, when the law is repealed it can be made to take effect at a time in the future or to take effect upon some prescribed act on the part of Canada. But that is the very objection I make to this arrangement. I do not want it to depend upon congressional action at all. Congress is now making a bargain with Canada. We are taking certain things from her in consideration of certain things that we give her. I want that bargain to end whenever the consideration upon either side fails; and then let Congress, of course, in pursuance of its continued power to deal with the tariff, prescribe such duties as it pleases.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was only going to say to the Senator from Iowa that, of course, in giving notice of the abrogation of a treaty it is given through the Executive in a formal way, generally the method being provided by the treaty itself. Congress could not communicate in a formal way to another Government that it was going to repeal this law, but Congress has its own method of notification, which would be that suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

If we were going to change our tariff law affecting Canada, of course we should put a limitation on it of time; and if Canada was going to change a law affecting us, she would give us notice by saying it should not take effect except at a certain time, which would give us ample opportunity for concurrent legislation.

The reason why I say that with so much confidence, if I may repeat for a moment what the Senator from Georgia has already very well said, is that it is inconceivable to my mind that either this country or Canada should be guilty of what would be a gross act of bad faith, to repeal this legislation, which, although not a treaty, is a reciprocal arrangement, without some notice. I do not apprehend for a moment that we would do it, and I can not conceive why we should impute it to Canada.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course one who wants this arrangement to go into effect and who is willing to assume that the Parliament of Canada will give us notice of her withdrawal of concessions upon her part, and is willing to assume further that then the Congress of the United States will take the measures that ought to be taken, will find the existing arrangement all that can be desired. I now add to what I have said in the second part of this division of my amendment this:

Provided further, That if at any time after the articles hereinbefore mentioned are admitted free under the aforesaid proclamation the President becomes satisfied that the rates of transportation upon any such article from Canada into the United States are unreasonably low, or are unreasonably high upon any such article from the United States, as compared with fair and reasonable rates upon the like article for substantially the same distance in the United States, he may issue his proclamation to that effect, and thereafter the said article or articles, when imported from Canada into the United States, shall be subject to the general tariff law of the United States.

I discussed this matter at some length a few days ago, and I shall not enlarge upon it. I simply remind Senators what it is. We are entering into an arrangement after which a very little discrimination upon the part of a transportation line from Canada into our markets or from our producing fields into Canada will destroy all the benefit that can be hoped from it by the people of this country.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator if this is a part of the same amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a part of the same amendment, although I can readily see it might well be divided, if anybody wants a division.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the amendment with reference to the proclamation of the President should stand alone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the statement of the senior Senator from Massachusetts that it is inconceivable that any government would take the course outlined by the Senator from Iowa is hardly in accordance with our political history. Under the McKinley law we had many reciprocity treaties with foreign countries, every one of which was denounced by President Cleveland without any notice or warning of any kind. Our Democratic friends were not as solicitous then about reciprocity as they are to-day. Then it was regarded as the handmaiden of protection, because it was an exchange in noncompetitive products; now it is circumscribed free trade in competitive products.

Mr. LODGE. That is exactly what I said—that the treaties provided for their own abrogation, and we were not called upon to give more than a certain notice. He gave it. He was not called upon to apologize. He was called upon, and he denounced those treaties under their own provision.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He denounced them because he was out of harmony with them.

Mr. LODGE. What he gave as the reason does not make any difference.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Without apology to anybody he denounced them.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A new issue may arise in Canada and they may denounce this arrangement, and if we are to await congressional action before we can denounce it, it seems to me we are subjecting ourselves to an imposition and a good deal of unnecessary annoyance.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty is denounced. This law would be repealed. They would not denounce it; they would repeal it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They would repeal their law.

Mr. LODGE. They would repeal their law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And we would have to repeal ours, either by legislation or automatically by power given to the President.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I come back to what I originally said. We have precisely the same power they have under this agreement, and they have precisely the same power that we have. They can repeal this legislation when they see fit, and so can we. I said I simply could not understand that either nation would repeal this law without the law carrying with it a substantial notification—that is, a limit of time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. What is the objection to allowing the concession upon one side to cease when the concession on the other side ceases?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is unnecessary, and I think it would simply tend to throw the bill into conference and perhaps endanger its passage. I do not think it of sufficient moment to amend this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to make this suggestion. Suppose after the presidential election in 1912 we discover that we have a Democratic Congress of free traders who believe in that principle, regardless of any concession from Canada. We still have a President until the 4th of March, 1913, who should at least be a protectionist in spots; and, Mr. President, I want him to have the automatic power and right to cancel this arrangement whenever the country that has given us similar concessions change their mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Michigan might well remember, too, that the next Senate of the country may be Democratic.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not say that it will be, but it might be that the next President of the United States will be a Republican.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; that condition may arise. But I hope if we are to have such a calamity that we will at least have the other blessing.

But, Mr. President, I feel very sure that the country would never forgive us if these concessions from Canada are to become ineffective in the law through a change of government, and our favors to them to remain binding upon us, getting nothing in return. The country would never excuse us for such a blunder as that, and so far as I am concerned, I do not propose to be put in that situation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator from Michigan that if Canada is to realize all the advantages and blessings out of this agreement and the United States is to get absolutely nothing in return, what reason is there to apprehend that Canada would ever fling away these golden apples of the Hesperides, if you please, or would ever jeopardize those blessings by repealing this agreement and affording that temptation to the United States to withdraw from Canada the infinity of blessings which she is to enjoy under this measure?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Oklahoma understands very well that there is a very sharp division of public opinion in Canada upon this question, as there is here. I do not understand how there can be that division, for I believe the advantages are to Canada and not to us; but looking it squarely in the face, he knows, and I know, that there is a very vigorous political movement in Canada against this legislation. If that becomes strong enough, whether the influences are from without or from within the Dominion to change her policy, I would much prefer that the arrangement on the part of the United States shall be canceled by Executive action, in order that any new concessions to be made by a new Congress to Canada or to any other country may be taken up unembarrassed by action on this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, I will ask for a further division of the question, so that the proviso or amendment which is under discussion can be voted upon separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 19 strike out the proviso beginning in line 15 and continuing down to line 23, and in lieu insert:

Provided further, That if at any time after said proclamation shall be issued the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence that the facts upon which the original proclamation was issued no longer exist, he shall then make proclamation to that effect, and the articles hereinbefore specified to be admitted to the United States exempt from duty shall be subject to such duties as the general tariff law of the United States shall then prescribe for such articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays upon his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. BAILEY's name was called). I was requested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to state to the Senate that he is suffering very much from an injured eye. He has been suffering all day and has been called from the Chamber on that account.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. He has been temporarily called from the Senate, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If he were present, I am informed, he would vote "nay." I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I do not know how he would vote if he were here. I feel constrained, therefore, to withdraw my vote. If he were here, I, of course, would vote for the amendment.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. CLAPP. I have permission to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT. My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city. I wish to announce that if he were present he would vote in the negative. I understand that he is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I made that announcement early, I should like to say, in fairness to him, and I asked that it might stand for the balance of the day.

Mr. DU PONT. I did not understand that.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bourne	Cummins	Heyburn	Nelson
Bristow	Curtis	Jones	Oliver
Brown	Dixon	Kenyon	Smith, Mich.
Clapp	Gallinger	La Follette	Townsend

So. Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now desire a vote upon the second paragraph of the division to which I called attention a few moments ago. I expected that it would be all voted upon together, but on the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] I separated the paragraph upon which we have just voted.

I now submit to the Senate this amendment to be added to the proviso:

Provided further, That if at any time after the articles hereinbefore mentioned are admitted free under the aforesaid proclamation the President becomes satisfied that the rates of transportation upon any such article from Canada into the United States are unreasonably low, or are unreasonably high upon any such article from the United States, as compared with fair and reasonable rates upon the like article for substantially the same distance in the United States, he may issue his proclamation to that effect, and thereafter the said article or articles, when imported from Canada into the United States, shall be subject to the general tariff law of the United States.

The Senate evidently is perfectly willing to trust to the good faith of Canada without any agreement with it whatsoever. I wonder whether it is also willing to trust to the good faith of the railroads of Canada that lead into the United States and into our markets and from our producing fields into the Canadian markets. The danger sought to be avoided by the amendment is not an imaginary one. It will be for the interest of the Canadian railroads to build up the industries of Canada and to promote the welfare of Canadian producers generally, and, as we all know, the variation of a few cents per hundred pounds would determine whether the products of Canada shall be consumed in our markets or whether there shall be consumed in our markets the products of the United States.

I do believe that we ought to have just a little care of our own producers. We have through long and weary years built up a system which now protects the various communities of the United States against unfair relative rates, but our business is now to be commingled with that of Canada; and over the rates between Canada and the United States and between the United States and Canada we have no control whatsoever. If we do not reserve the power to retaliate if there shall be unreasonable discrimination against our products in the business of these railroads, we will suffer just so surely as time goes on.

I submit this amendment, Mr. President, and upon it I ask for the yeas and nays, saying at the same time that I shall not ask for the yeas and nays upon any other of my amendments.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. BAILEY's name was called). I again announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has been called from the Chamber on account of suffering with his eyes.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is temporarily absent from the Senate, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], and withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). In justice to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], with whom I have a general pair, I want it to appear distinctly in the RECORD that he informed me of his intended absence; that on all amendments to this bill he would vote "nay," and that I would be at liberty to vote if I voted in accordance with the way he would vote. As it has transpired that on these amendments we would vote the same way, I desire that the notice which I gave earlier in the evening shall stand for the remainder of the day, and I want this in the RECORD, showing that I keep faith with him, as I know he would do the same with me. I vote "nay."

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). If my pair, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], were present, he would vote "nay" on all these amendments. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire again to announce the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and to say that, if present, the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea" on this amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bourne	Clapp	Dixon	La Follette
Bristow	Clark, Wyo.	Gronna	Nelson
Brown	Cummins	Kenyon	Simmons

NAYS—46.

Bacon	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the remainder of the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are a great number of other amendments in the series which I have offered, but I think they are pretty well known to the Senate, and I do not want to detain the Senate longer if I may have unanimous consent to vote upon the remainder of my amendments en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote will be taken en bloc upon the remainder of the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa. The question is on those amendments.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. The decapitation is so perfectly complete that I thought voting upon them en bloc was quite right. There is, Mr. President, one amendment that I intend to propose which has not yet been offered; and therefore, I suppose, it is not within the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not if it has not yet been offered, but simply proposed to be offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is proposed to be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in the printed copy of the Senator's amendments?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then, it is not covered by the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I supposed that it was not within the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not covered by the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had not intended this evening to offer the amendments which I intend to propose, but I understand, as they are included in the unanimous-consent arrangement, that it will be necessary for me to offer them during this legislative day. They are somewhat similar to the amendments that have been acted upon. One of them puts meats of all kinds, fresh, dried, and so on, including hams and bacon, on the free list, transferring them from the dutiable to the free list. The other amendment transfers flour of all kinds, oatmeal, and so on, from the dutiable list to the free list.

Mr. President, I desire to say that while I offer these amendments and ask for a vote, I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote on them; but I will be content just to have a viva voce vote of the Senate. I know they will be voted down as in Committee of the Whole, but when the bill gets into the Senate I shall offer them again and ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out on page 1, line 10 to line 12, inclusive, the following words:

Fresh meats—Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats excepting game, 1¼ cents per pound.

Strike out on page 2, line 1 to line 13, inclusive, the following words:

Bacon and hams, not in tins or jars, 1¼ cents per pound.
Meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner, not otherwise herein provided for, 1¼ cents per pound.
Canned meats and canned poultry, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Extract of meat, fluid or not, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearine, and animal stearine, 1¼ cents per pound. Tallow, 40 cents per 100 pounds.

Insert on page 16, after the words "all other live animals," in line 6, the following words:

Fresh meats—Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats excepting game.
Bacon and hams, not in tins or jars.
Meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner, not otherwise herein provided for.
Canned meats and canned poultry.
Extract of meat, fluid or not.
Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearine, and animal stearine.
Tallow.

Also to strike out, on page 10, from line 10 to line 25, inclusive, and on page 11, from line 1 to line 10, inclusive, the following words:

Wheat flour and semolina, and rye flour, 50 cents per barrel of 196 pounds.
Oatmeal and rolled oats, including the weight of paper covering, 50 cents per 100 pounds.
Corn meal, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.
Barley malt, 45 cents per 100 pounds.
Barley, pot, pearled, or patent, one-half cent per pound.
Buckwheat flour or meal, one-half cent per pound.
Split peas, dried, 7½ cents per bushel of 60 pounds.
Prepared cereal foods, not otherwise provided for herein, 17½ per cent ad valorem.
Bran, middlings, and other offals of grain used for animal food, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.
Macaroni and vermicelli, 1 cent per pound.
Biscuits, wafers, and cakes, when sweetened with sugar, honey, molasses, or other material, 25 per cent ad valorem.
Biscuits, wafers, cakes, and other baked articles, composed in whole or in part of eggs or any kind of flour or meal, when combined with chocolate, nuts, fruits, or confectionery; also candied peel, candied popcorn, candied nuts, candied fruits, sugar candy, and confectionery of all kinds, 32½ per cent ad valorem.

And insert on page 16 of the bill, after the words "and beans and edible," in line 9, the following words:

Wheat flour and semolina, and rye flour.
Oatmeal and rolled oats, including weight of paper covering.
Corn meal.
Barley malt.
Barley, pot, pearled, or patent.
Buckwheat flour or meal.
Split peas, dried.
Prepared cereal foods not otherwise provided for herein.
Bran, middlings, and other offals of grain used for animal food.
Macaroni and vermicelli.
Biscuits, wafers, and cakes, when sweetened with sugar, honey, molasses, or other material.
Biscuits, wafers, cakes, and other baked articles composed in whole or in part of eggs or any kind of flour or meal, when combined with chocolate, nuts, fruits, or confectionery; also candied peel, candied popcorn, candied nuts, candied fruits, sugar candy, and confectionery of all kinds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing en bloc to the amendments offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STONE. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STONE. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to state that he had one amendment yet pending that had not been acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not pending, but printed separately and not yet offered. It was not covered by the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. STONE. The unanimous-consent agreement covered all amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to by the Senator from Iowa has not been offered.

Mr. STONE. Oh, not offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I explain to the Senator from Missouri how it happened? The amendment has not been printed——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. STONE. Let the matter go.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 11, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 11, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to ask for information or to make a suggestion. I notice in the reading of the Journal that mention is given on every occasion of the absence of a quorum and the roll call. It seems to me that that might very well be eliminated from the Journal. It accomplishes no good purpose at all, and it is not information that is valuable to anyone. I suggest that, there being no rule requiring it, such proceedings should not appear in the Journal. In the RECORD it is proper to appear, but it is not necessary that it should appear in the Journal, and I can see no good purpose served.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Rule IV provides that—

The proceedings of the Senate shall be briefly and accurately stated on the Journal.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are a great many, because speeches are proceedings of the Senate. Still we exercise a discriminating judgment in regard to the matter. I merely mention it for consideration. I think it is worthy of consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. Of course the Journal is made up by the Secretary, not by the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was aware of that, of course.

The Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN. I present a resolution adopted by the Assembly of the State of Connecticut, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
General Assembly, January Session, 1911.

Resolution concerning the extension of domestic general parcels post.

Resolved by this assembly, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States are hereby requested to do all in their power to secure the immediate passage of an act providing for the extension of our domestic general parcels post in substantial accordance with the provisions of a bill entitled "A bill to reduce postal rates, to improve the postal service, and to increase postal revenues," being H. R. 14, Sixty-second Congress, first session, and providing as follows:

"That the common weight limit of the domestic postal service of the United States is hereby increased to 11 pounds, the common limit of the Universal Postal Union, and that in the general business of the post office the 1-cent-an-ounce rate on general merchandise—fourth-class mail matter—be, and is hereby, reduced to the third-class rate, 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

"SEC. 2. That the rate on local letters or sealed parcels posted for delivery within the free-delivery services is hereby determined at 2 cents on parcels up to 4 ounces, 1 cent on each additional 2 ounces; at nondelivery offices, 1 cent for each 2 ounces.

"SEC. 3. That all mail matter collected and delivered within the different rural routes of the United States is hereby determined to be in one class, with rates, door to door, between the different houses and places of business and the post office or post offices on each route, as follows: On parcels up to one twenty-fourth of a cubic foot, or 1 by 6 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 1 pound in weight, 1 cent; on larger parcels up to one-half a cubic foot, or 6 by 12 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 11 pounds in weight, 5 cents; on larger parcels up to 1 cubic foot, 6 by 12 by 24 inches in dimensions and up to 25 pounds in weight, 10 cents. No parcel shall be over 6 feet in length, and in no case shall a carrier be obliged to transport a load of over 500 pounds.

"SEC. 4. That on all unregistered prepaid mail matter without declared value an indemnity up to $10 shall be paid by the Post Office Department for such actual loss or damage as may occur through the fault of the postal service, and this without extra charge. Certificates of posting shall be provided on demand. On registered parcels of declared value and on which the fee for registration, insurance, and postage has been duly prepaid, the Post Office Department shall pay the full value of any direct loss or damage that may occur through the fault of the postal service. The fees for insurance and registration shall be as follows: For registration and insurance up to $50, 10 cents; for each additional $50, 2 cents. No claim for compensation will be admitted if not presented within one year after the parcel is posted.

"SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect six months from and after the date of approval thereof."

House of representatives. Passed June 13, 1911.
Senate. Passed June 22, 1911.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of Local Division No. 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Windsor Locks, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of the congregations of the Twelfth Street Presbyterian Church, of Alton, and of Edna M. Garrigues, of Trenton, in the State of Illinois; of the Friends Christian Endeavor Society, of Glen Elder, and of sundry citizens of Parsons, in the State of Kansas; and of sundry citizens of Concord, Mass., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Pottsville, Pa., and a petition of the Board of Trade of Reading, Pa., praying for the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of Local Union No. 81, of Pittsburg; of Local Union No. 273, of Philadelphia; and of Local Union No. 249, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Pittsburg, Pa., and a petition of the National Association of Automobile Manufacturers, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the so-called corporation-tax law permitting corporations to make returns at the end of their fiscal years, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Association of Retail Druggists of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the imposition of a stamp tax on proprietary medicines, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERN presented resolutions adopted by Group 8, Indiana Bankers' Association, at Vincennes, Ind., and resolutions adopted by Group 1, Indiana Bankers' Association, of Indiana, favoring the adoption of the currency system as proposed by the National Monetary Commission, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 22, 1911.

Ordered, That the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, speaking for the people of the Commonwealth, does hereby express its sense that uniform treatment and protection should be accorded to every American citizen, regardless of race, color, creed, or religious faith, and that every earnest and peaceful effort should be made by the executive department of this Government to secure from the Governments of all other countries uniformity of treatment and protection to American citizens holding passports duly issued by the authorities of the United States, in order that all American citizens shall have guaranteed freedom of travel and sojourn, without regard to race, color, creed, or religious faith, in all countries holding friendly relations with the United States, and that in every country at least equal rights and privileges be granted to all such American citizens as are granted to the citizens of any other country; and be it further

Ordered, That the United States Government be, and hereby is, strongly urged to exert all possible means to procure either an amendment to the present treaty with Russia or a new treaty with that country by which American citizens, regardless of race, color, creed, or religious faith, resorting to that country for peaceful and legitimate purposes of travel, business, or domicile, shall no longer be treated with discrimination; and be it further

Ordered, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their efforts to bring about this highly desirable result; and be it further Ordered, That the secretary of the Commonwealth be requested to transmit a copy of these orders to the President of the United States, to each member of his Cabinet, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Sent up for concurrence.

JAMES W. KIMBALL, Clerk.

SENATE, June 27, 1911.

Adopted in concurrence.

HENRY D. COOLIDGE, Clerk.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Boston, June 30, 1911.

A true copy. Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. PERKINS presented resolutions adopted at the annual session of the California Yearly Meeting of Friends' Church, held at Whittier, Cal., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, favoring the immediate extension of our domestic general parcels post, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. (See first column of this page.)

NATIONAL ARCHIVES BUILDING.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I present a memorial for a national archives building at the Federal seat of government which has been sent by the department of archives and history in the two States of Mississippi and Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 64.)

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know what the document is, as I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a memorial sent by the department of archives and history of the States of Alabama and Mississippi requesting the erection at the Federal seat of government of a national archives building. It is very short, containing only about four pages, giving very concisely the reasons why it is necessary and advisable to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order to print as a document is entered.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to publish as a part of the remarks I made on yesterday on the reciprocity bill certain tables which I intended to use, but which I did not do on account of interruptions, and also a circular issued by the executive committee of my State, to which I referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from North Carolina is granted.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From the Committee on Territories I report back favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States, and I submit a report (No. 100) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, in making the report of the Committee on Territories I desire to say that it was the understanding among the members of the committee that each member should be privileged to make such report and offer such amendments as he felt called upon to propose.

Mr. CLAPP. Such recommendations?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Such recommendations and such amendments. I simply desire to say that I am personally very friendly to the prompt admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States, but it may be deemed expedient, in order to accomplish that end at the present session, that certain amendments shall be considered, and I desire to give notice of my intention to offer an amendment later upon the question of the judicial recall respecting the constitution of Arizona.

Further, Mr. President, as soon as it seems advisable, I shall at an early day ask the Senate to fix a definite time when we may vote upon the joint resolution, with such amendments as may be offered and as have been made by the committee.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Minnesota, the ranking member of the committee, I assume desires to speak to the same question. I therefore yield to him.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the minority of the committee, I desire to state briefly that while we were in favor of the admission of New Mexico with the constitution it has adopted without any qualification, the minority of the committee are utterly opposed to the admission of Arizona with the constitution that they present to Congress. We are opposed to it especially on two grounds. First, because it involves the recall of the judges; and second, that a mere 15 per cent of the last vote for governor can propose a constitutional amendment for adoption by the people. We think that in those respects, aside from many others, the constitution is vitally defective, and that the State never ought to be admitted with those provisions in its constitution.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3000) granting a pension to Howard Reeder; and

A bill (S. 3001) granting a pension to Caroline S. Mindil; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 3002) granting an increase of pension to Samuel T. Mills (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3003) granting an increase of pension to Alonzo J. Mather (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3004) granting a pension to Rose Anna Nagley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 3005) for the relief of the Grand Lake Stream Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3006) granting an increase of pension to Ira Flagg (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3007) granting an increase of pension to Sara A. Haskell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 3008) to authorize the extension of Eighteenth Street NE. (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3009) to authorize the extension of Irving Street NE. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 3010) granting an increase of pension to Eli Hoyt (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 3011) for the relief of David Lowry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. THORNTON:

A bill (S. 3012) for the relief of the estate of Heluter Tounoir, deceased;

A bill (S. 3013) for the relief of the estate of Vamalle Basile, deceased; and

A bill (S. 3014) for the relief of the estate of Augustin Laban, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3015) granting an increase of pension to George F. Sawin (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 3016) granting an increase of pension to Robert R. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

SALOONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, it was Ordered, That 25 copies only of the map prepared under the supervision of the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], relating to the location of the saloons of the District of Columbia, be printed for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PENSACOLA NAVY YARD.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit a resolution and ask permission of the Senate to make a brief statement in connection with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 100) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate as promptly as possible what orders, if any, he has issued respecting the navy yard at Pensacola, Fla.; what work incident to navy yards has been done at said navy yard within the last two fiscal years; whether work can be done at said navy yard as economically as at other navy yards, and if not, why not; whether specific appropriations for elevator of March 3, 1905, amounting to $1,000, and for remodeling building of March 3, 1909, amounting to $15,000, have been expended as provided by said acts; and if not, why not; and that he further report whether it is his intention to abandon work at said navy yard.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this resolution is prompted by some recent orders of the Secretary of the Navy, the precise nature of which I am not advised, but consider it of public interest to know. Certain consequences have followed which indicate quite clearly the general character of the orders and the plain purpose of the Navy Department with respect to the navy yard at Pensacola, Fla.

This yard is included in a Government reservation of some 1,800 acres fronting on Pensacola Bay between the city of Pensacola and the entrance channel from the Gulf, off the end of Santa Rosa Island, which lies between the bay and the Gulf, and where is established Fort Pickens, with its sea wall, protected fort, retreating guns, and modern equipment.

There has been expended on this navy yard by the Government to June 30, 1910 (Rept., p. 31), for land, public works and improvements, and machinery installed, and maintenance, including repairs, a total of $12,217,413.11.

It has a walled-in area larger than any naval reservation in the country. The commandant's residence is a handsome structure. The hospital is a large buildling. The officers' and men's quarters are commodious. A splendid power plant is in fine condition. A water and pumping system is quite extensive. There is a considerable settlement, called Warrington, on the reservation, where the workmen are afforded good houses and yard room, under modern sanitary conditions. Electric-light plant, artesian water, sewerage system, wharves, docks, hoisting and other machinery, including a floating dock, which cost just after the Spanish War, in Habana Harbor, some $90,000, make the yard quite complete of its class.

More important than all else mentioned is the fact that as the commandant, Admiral Lucien Young, reports a war vessel drawing 30 to 35 feet of water can come limping alongside the wharf at this yard the darkest night. I challenge the department or anyone to point out such a harbor on either coast. Our largest battleships have maneuvered in that harbor without a mishap of any kind. Examine the charts and be convinced that nowhere have we a superior harbor, and I need not make further comparison.

Work can be done in this yard every day in the year. The climatic conditions are most desirable. The coal and iron and timber and all needed supplies are close at hand. Ample supply of labor under the most healthy and comfortable conditions is obtainable readily. Shipbuilding or repairing—all kinds of work—can be done there with a maximum of economy.

The proximity of the Central American countries, the Panama Canal, the West Indies, Cuba, the Caribbean Sea, emphasizes the importance of the location.

The proposition is to close that yard and the one at New Orleans and leave the 3,000 miles of Gulf coast and the South Atlantic coast without any yard where a vessel, even an injured torpedo boat, could be repaired. It is proposed to have a station at Key West—a sort of subbase for coaling and supplies—but no yard.

It is quite clear to most people that if we ever have any cause for engaging our Navy in actual service the seat of trouble will likely be in the Caribbean and Gulf of Mexico.

If navy yards are to be abandoned, shall they be those nearest the zone of conflict—within a few hundred miles at most—or should they be those several thousand miles distant from the place of need?

It is admitted that this yard was established by act of Congress. From time to time, and as late as June 24, 1910, Congress has made specific appropriations for it. Clearly Congress has expressed no intention, not even an intimation of a purpose, to abandon this yard. The Secretary of the Navy has recently discharged about 60 per cent of the employees, 131 in number, and transferred the officers and packed up the stores on hand for shipment to some other point, and evidently intends to make further reduction in the force at an early date, until there will be left a chief carpenter, as the officer in charge, and a half dozen watchmen and caretakers to look after the property. The yard will be closed. Not a hammer will be heard. The expensive machinery will be given a coat of white lead and a farewell. The docks and wharves will be neglected and go fast to destruction. Snakes will crawl through the weeds which will cover those now beautiful grounds. Bats and owls will make their homes in the unoccupied buildings. The men who have lived in Warrington for half a century and performed well such work as a discriminating department allowed them to have must seek some other abiding place. Desolation will take the place of what could and should be a well-ordered, busy, hustling, thoroughgoing, up-to-date, well-appointed, efficient navy yard, under skillful operation and masterful direction. The Government property, worth millions of dollars, will go to certain and speedy ruin.

All this because the Navy Department asserts its right and its choice to do indirectly, in effect, what it can not do directly. It has no authority to abandon the yard; it claims the power to close it. The difference is about the same as that between "tweedledum" and "tweedledee." For my part I would rather see the yard abandoned than closed. It would seem reasonable and appropriate and advisable to consult and obtain the concurrence of Congress before taking such a course. Congress, before deciding so serious a question, involving a reversal of past policies, turning against a yard and harbor selected nearly a century ago and favored by experts since, and sacrificing valuable property, would likely, through its regular or special committees, make a careful examination of the whole matter and give due consideration to all the facts, circumstances, and conditions. The conclusion, when that is done, will find acceptance. Until then I question the wisdom and the authority to peremptorily discharge the force and close the yard, as the department proposes. I claim, for instance, that specific appropriations for that yard made by Congress must be used there and can not be applied elsewhere.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows these appropriations at page 217, and the unused portions aggregate $74,359.38. I claim that the Secretary of the Navy can not establish a naval base in this or a foreign country without the consent of and provision by Congress, and if one be established at Guantanamo or anywhere else, it does not follow that thereby the Secretary is given leave and license to abandon or close yards long established elsewhere, in the teeth of Congress and against every expression he has ever been able to wring from Congress. It is important to know precisely what is being done in this respect and the reasons and authority for such action. Not only Florida and the Gulf States, but the whole country is concerned in this matter.

The Pensacola Navy Yard was established in 1824, having been selected by a board of naval officers. President Adams, December 3, 1825, approved the action of Congress, and oak forests in the vicinity were purchased for shipbuilding purposes. When the State was admitted, in 1845, Gov. Broome affirmed Federal jurisdiction. In 1836 a complete plan for a first-class naval station was commenced, and by 1861 it became one of the most complete and efficient stations in the country. Admiral Farragut reported that Pensacola should be retained as the first-class navy yard of the South.

To say that along with Pensacola and New Orleans should be abolished New London and Sacketts Harbor is trifling. New London has not been a navy yard since the Civil War, and Sacketts Harbor is only a somewhat unimportant sailors' home.

We contend this yard is sufficiently fortified, or easily can be. It should be made a first-class yard. It is easy to say the expenditures there exceed the productive work at present. It is a very simple matter for the department to deny work to a yard—starve it—and then cite the pay roll and other expenses in comparison with the amount of work turned out and prove that a wise economy dictates the cutting down of expenses. That simply means that the necessary expenses of a man without employment exceed his income. There is work to do, but if it is sent elsewhere and there is nothing furnished the yard to do the very condition complained of is produced. The evidence that the yard is unprofitable is manufactured thus by those who would destroy it.

Pensacola does an export business of more than $20,000,000 annually, and considerable work could be done for outside concerns while Government work is slack at this yard.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution lie on the table until called up for some further remarks by my colleague, and possibly by myself, before action is taken upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. BORAH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 101), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,440 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412, the reciprocity bill.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pending the motion, the Senator from Minnesota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. THORNTON. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] is absent from his seat on account of business at a committee meeting.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for a call of the absentees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks for a call of the absentees. Without objection, the Secretary will call the list of the absentees.

Mr. LODGE. Has the number of those present been announced?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not. A quorum is present. The Senator from Idaho asks for a call of the absentees.

The Secretary called the list of absentees, as follows:

Messrs. Bailey, Bankhead, Borah, Bradley, Bristow, Brown, Chilton, Clark of Wyoming, Clarke of Arkansas, Crawford, Culberson, Davis, Dillingham, Dixon, du Pont, Foster, Frye, Gamble, Gore, Hitchcock, Jones, La Follette, Lea, Lorimer, Newlands, O'Gorman, Owen, Paynter, Percy, Poindexter, Rayner, Richardson, Shively, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Michigan, Stephenson, Stone, Terrell, Tillman, Townsend, Warren, Watson, Wetmore, and Williams.

Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. BROWN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The list of Senators answering on the roll call is as follows:

Bacon	Cummins	Lodge	Poindexter
Bourne	Curtis	McCumber	Pomerene
Brandegee	Fletcher	McLean	Reed
Briggs	Foster	Martin, Va.	Root
Bristow	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Brown	Gronna	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Guggenheim	Nelson	Smoot
Burnham	Heyburn	Nixon	Sutherland
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Taylor
Clapp	Kenyon	Page	Thornton
Crane	Kern	Penrose	Williams
Cullom	Lippitt	Perkins	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONS OF NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reciprocity bill may be temporarily laid aside in order that I may be permitted to address the Senate on House joint resolution 14, in accordance with notice previously given.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reciprocity bill will be temporarily laid aside, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Utah, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, during the last few years the United States of America has become the field of operation for an amiable band of insurgent soothsayers, who have been going up and down the land indulging in cabalistic utterances respecting the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and divers and sundry other ingenious devices for realizing the millenium by the ready and simple method of voting it out of its present state of incubation. They direct our attention to the clouds flying above the far western horizon, upon which the flaming finger of the Oregon sun has traced, in radiant and opalescent tints, glowing pathways and shining minarets, stately temples and castles and palaces, pinnacles of gold and caves of purple, and they tell us that these are the visible signs which mark the exact location of the new and improved political Jerusalem, where the wicked officeholders cease from troubling and the weary voters do all the work. They bid us join them in an airy pilgrimage to this scene of pure delight, and assure us that here, high above all selfish and mundane things, is the land "flowing with milk and honey," where every bird is a songster, where the exquisite and perfect flowers of political purity are in perpetual bloom, where "every prospect pleases" and only the "standpatter" is vile, where all the laws are perfect and corruption and wickedness are forgotten legends.

A good many people are accepting the invitation, without taking the precaution to secure return tickets.

As an humble observer of this spectacular enterprise I have thought it worth while to interrupt the somewhat monotonous consideration of the reciprocity bill long enough to suggest some reasons for anticipating the abrupt and inevitable return of these hopeful aeronauts to the solid earth after these alluring visions shall have faded into the damp and ghostly fog, the cold and unsubstantial mist, of which they are composed, and into which certain enthusiastic but irresponsible "balloonatics" have carried them in a balloon all gas and no ballast.

The conditions to which I have thus briefly alluded find a striking illustration in the proposed constitution of Arizona, which is now before the Senate for consideration. There has been more or less controversy respecting the precise authority of Congress in dealing with the proposed constitutions of Arizona and New Mexico. It has been broadly asserted that the only authority of Congress is to determine whether or not these proposed constitutions establish a government republican in form and contain certain provisions definitely specified by the enabling act. The so-called New Mexico-Arizona enabling act provides that—

When said constitution and such provisions thereof as have been separately submitted shall have been duly ratified by the people, * * * a certified copy of the same shall be submitted to the President * * * and to Congress for approval. * * * And if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the separate provisions thereof, if any, or if the President approves the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then and in that event the President shall certify said facts to the governor, * * * who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of said notification, * * * issue his proclamation for the election of the State and county officers—

And so on.

Before either New Mexico or Arizona is entitled to admission, four distinct steps are required:

1. The framing of the constitution and its submission to a vote of the people of the State.

2. The adoption of the constitution by a majority vote of the people.

3. The approval of the constitution by the President; and

4. The failure of Congress to disapprove the same at the next regular session after the approval of the President.

Neither the authority of the President nor of Congress in passing upon this question is limited by any language in the enabling act. In terms their power to approve or disapprove is as broad as that of the people in voting upon the question of the ratification or rejection of the proposed constitution. If the President's authority is limited, it is not because of anything in the enabling act, but from the fact that the power to admit new States is one belonging to Congress, which can not be delegated by that body to the President, and it may be well contended that while Congress could delegate to the President the power to determine the existence of a fact—as, for example, that the constitution provided for a government republican in form and contained certain specified provisions upon the existence of which the admission of the State should depend—Congress could not delegate the power to admit or decline to admit the State at his discretion. However this may be so far as the President is concerned, no such limitation attaches to the power of Congress.

The Senate Committee on Territories, reporting the bill to enable the people of Arizona and New Mexico to form constitutions, after calling attention to the provision—

That the President and Congress, representing the Nation, shall review the constitutions of the proposed new States which the Nation is about to admit as a portion of its governing and lawmaking elements—

And to the further fact—that the Nation is interested as vitally in the form of government of the States which it creates as are the new States themselves—

Said:

It is not only a measure of justice, but a measure of safety which will certainly prevent any unsound or harmful provisions in the constitutions of the proposed new States. This, of course, will be beneficial to the proposed new States as well as to the Nation.

Clearly, then, it was contemplated that the responsibility of Congress in the matter should attach to every part of the constitutions, because the power is to be exercised so as to "prevent any unsound or harmful provisions in the proposed constitutions."

This was the view of the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, chairman of the committee, who said that by this requirement there was—afforded a safeguard as to the wisdom of its provisions. A constitution is no light thing. It can not hurt anybody to have a constitution carefully drawn; it may help wonderfully to have it reviewed. It is sure to be not less thoughtful on that account. Also, the Nation is as much concerned as the State, for the State is to become a part of the governing power of the Nation.

In the consideration of either of these constitutions, therefore, the entire instrument is before us, and if upon the whole it is of such character or contain such provisions that Congress should not approve, it is the plain duty of that body to disapprove. We shall not, of course, disapprove for light or trivial reasons, but if there is contained in either constitution provisions which we believe to be radically wrong or subversive of the principles of good government, I conceive it to be our plain duty under the enabling act to so declare.

Complaints have been made respecting both the proposed constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona. The principal objection to the New Mexico constitution is that the power of amendment is not sufficiently elastic; that amendments will be too difficult to obtain. With that criticism I am unable to agree. It seems to me that the proposed constitution of New Mexico, like that of Arizona, may be justly criticized for ignoring the principle that constitutions are made to declare and establish fundamental law as distinguished from ordinary legislation. Both constitutions exhibit an unfortunate tendency to deal overmuch with mere details which should have been left to legislation. That, however, is an incident with which we should not, I think, undertake to deal. Legislative acts should be capable of being readily changed to suit the sometimes rapidly changing needs of the community, but constitutions are, or should be, declarations of the permanent, settled, broadly fundamental policies of the State, not to be lightly altered upon the mere caprice of the moment, but only after the most serious and deliberate consideration.

Prof. Stimson admirably states the distinction, as follows:

The Constitution is the permanent will of the people; the law is but the temporary act of their representatives, who have only such power as the people choose to give them.

If the Constitution of the United States had provided for its own amendment as easily as some few of the State constitutions provide, that great instrument would long since have become a medley of incongruous provisions and a patchwork of the shifting foibles of every generation. A written constitution means nothing unless it means stability and permanency. It is the fundamental law, the foundation upon which rests the whole superstructure of the State; and, like the foundation of a great building, the continual tearing out of a stone here and the insertion of another there will threaten the integrity of the whole structure. To call a constitution which may change with every shifting breath of popular emotion "fundamental law" is a perversion of language. Such a constitution is not to be likened to the foundation of an edifice, but rather to the weathercock upon the steeple, that simply registers the direction of each passing breeze.

The objections to the New Mexico constitution, compared with the Arizona constitution, are not, to my mind, of a serious character, and I shall not spend further time in their discussion, but confine myself to the Arizona constitution; and inasmuch as the features of that instrument which seem to me objectionable are illustrative of what I conceive to be an unwise, dangerous, and growing tendency toward the gradual breaking down of the American system of government throughout the country, I shall discuss the subject in a somewhat general way. I am aware of the fact that it is not fashionable to find fault with any of the new-fangled political fads which are being rather intemperately advocated under the claim of restoring a government by the people. Anyone who doubts the wisdom of the initiative and referendum, the recall, or the direct primary is at once set down by certain self-constituted guardians of the people's rights as a "reactionary" or a "standpatter," and only those who accept the whole program from prologue to epilogue are considered worthy to be called progressive.

Somebody has defined a standpatter as a man who has stopped and can not start and a progressive as one who has started and can not stop. If these definitions are to be accepted as accurate, sensible people will avoid both schools. It would seem to be the part of wisdom to delay starting at least long enough to ascertain where we are going and why, and then to keep going as long as we are headed in the right direction, and to stop whenever we discover that we have lost our bearings. Movement and improvement are not always synonymous terms. Just now there is a good deal of political and social unrest, not only among our own people, but throughout the world. That there is justification for much of the dissatisfaction which exists can probably not be truthfully denied. The conditions, however, which have given rise to this feeling call for sane, wise, level-headed counsel and consideration. But instead of these the agitator is abroad and confusion of thought results. Evils exist as they have always existed. Many remedies are being suggested, some of them good, some of them foolish, many of them utterly vicious and impracticable. There are quacks in politics as there are quacks in medicine, and in the one case as in the other, the quack is usually identified by the superabundance of the laudation with which he advertises himself and his remedies.

The value of a remedy in politics, as in medicine, is to be determined by its efficiency as a curative, and not by the name which its compounders have caused to be blown into the bottle or the promises which they have made in their advertising circulars. Between the political quack, who thinks only of himself, and the political zealot, who does not think at all, we are in grave danger of having all the stability and sanity ground out of our institutions. What we need, in my judgment, is not so much the adoption of new, experimental—not to say dangerous—panaceas for the ills of the body politic, as the conscientious and vigorous enforcement of the old and proven remedies.

Sir, we are living in strenuous days. Everybody seems to be afflicted in one form or another with the speed mania. We are not content to jog along in the old family carriage after the comfortable manner of our fathers; we must hurl ourselves through the land in high-power automobiles, dividing the population into the "quick and the dead" as we pass. The stagecoach has been relegated to the scrap heap, and the Twentieth Century Limited has taken its place. The post office has fallen into more or less disuse, and we are carrying on our correspondence over the telegraph wires by night lettergrams and day lettergrams. The housewife no longer shops with market basket upon her arm; she telephones the grocer and adds the bill for both telephones to the cost of living. To do everything more quickly, to travel faster and faster is the growing obsession of the times, and we are eagerly looking forward to the day when we shall fly through the air without the encumbrance of a gasoline tank, drawing propulsive power as we go from the electric waves which fill the universe with the mysterious energy of their rise and fall. The microbe of restlessness has invaded not only our social but our business and political life as well. We are no longer satisfied to lay by a modest competency for our old age by years of thrift and economy. We must get rich over night by betting on the price of wheat. Houses are no longer built from the foundation up, brick upon brick and stone upon stone. Tremendous steel frames, 10, 20, 40 stories in height, are elevated by the aid of steam and crane, and bricks are laid and windows put in upon every floor at the same time. The roof is fastened on before the cellar is finished. It is not strange that in the universal fever of haste government itself should be swept by this mad spirit of impatience, which has given rise to the new apostle of reform, whose demand is that we shall abandon the methodical habits of the past and go careering after novel and untried things. The speed limit has been taken off, the "stop, look, and listen" sign removed, and the importunate cry is, "Full speed ahead! Get somewhere else than where you are—it matters not where—only, in God's name, let it be quickly!"

Changes in governmental forms are advocated apparently for the mere sake of change. So many strange and doubtful experiments are being undertaken that we shall end by finding ourselves overwhelmed by their very multiplicity and impracticability. The minds of the people are being filled with all sorts of idealistic theories, beautiful in promise but ineffective in performance. Every self-constituted reformer brings to the quilting bee his favorite patch, and when the work shall be completed our scheme of government will be as bizarre as the old-fashioned crazy quilt of our grandmothers. It is high time for a reaction to that ancient but discredited common sense which thinks before it acts instead of repenting afterwards.

It is one of the penalties of advancing civilization that the feet of progress must sometimes go through the mire before they can plant themselves on the firm upland. That man is the truest pilot whose keen vision soonest makes out the direction in which the upland lies and, in safety rather than in haste, leads us to it, and he but a false pilot or an arrant knave, whatsoever he may call himself or howsoever loudly he may anathematize the mire, if he but lead us, however swiftly, round and round the vicious circle within the swamp. The problems with which we have to deal are full of perplexity and complexity. They can not be solved by a simple wave of the hand in a moment of time, by hysterical denunciation, by the undigested theories of the visionary and the dreamer, by the self-serving mouthings of the demagogue, or by the mere counting of heads at the ballot box. They call for thoroughgoing investigation, dispassionate consideration, wise statesmanship, and sometimes for that courageous patience which moves deliberately in the face of clamorous demands to make haste. There is overmuch waving of flags and beating of drums and blowing of horns. The voice of the professional reformer is heard in the land insistently calling upon us to forsake the ancient and well-beaten paths along which we have proceeded, at least in security, for a century and a quarter and go headlong in new and unexplored directions, luckily to find ourselves in pleasant fields and firm footing or unluckily plunged over the precipice or engulfed in the dismal swamp.

The so-called popular-government propaganda has for its ostensible object the broadening and strengthening of power in the hands of the people, but its tendency is to emasculate and ultimately destroy representative government. Its adherents in their enthusiasm have advocated what seem to me some very wild and visionary schemes, admirably calculated to inflame the popular imagination, but which, however much they may increase the direct participation of the multitude in the affairs of government, will, I am persuaded, give them not a better but a far less efficient and desirable government than they now have. I do not mean to say that I am opposed to every suggested alteration in the existing governmental framework. To oppose a new thing simply because it is new is quite as bad as to insist upon change merely because it is change.

But I am opposed to the initiative, the modern referendum, and the recall, because I believe that if these innovations shall be generally put into practice the inevitable result will be the gradual breaking down of the strength and the ultimate destruction of our republican institutions, under which for a hundred and twenty-four years we have steadily advanced in population, wealth, and civilization, until we are to-day not only the greatest nation in the world, but the greatest that the sun has ever looked upon in all his shining course. In saying this I am not opposing any honest effort to eradicate the evils which exist under this form of government. There is a vital distinction, however, between a bad plan of government and the imperfect operation of a good plan. If legislation by representative bodies is sometimes unsatisfactory, inadequate, or corrupt, it is not because the plan of representative government is at fault, but because, although inherently good, it is badly administered.

Mr. President, I am no standpatter. I am not in favor of standing still. No one who takes the slightest thought desires that we shall do that. Of course, we must advance, but we must at our peril distinguish between real progress and what amounts to a mere manifestation of the speed mania. Among the games of the ancient Greeks there was a running match in which each participant carried a lighted torch. The prize was awarded not to that one who crossed the line first, but to him who crossed the line first with his torch still burning. It is important that we should advance, but the vital thing is not that we should simply get somewhere—anywhere—quickly, but that we should arrive at a definite goal with the torch of sanity and safety still ablaze.

Our present form of representative government, under which laws are made by specially chosen legislators, construed by specially chosen and trained judges, and enforced by specially chosen executive officers, I am firmly convinced is the only practicable form of government for a country of immense area and great population such as ours. Whenever it proves ineffective or works badly the fault is not with the machinery, but with those who are operating it. The remedy is not for the people en masse to attempt to manipulate the complicated and delicately adjusted mechanism, which must inevitably lead to confusion and disaster, but to exercise more care in the selection of their specially chosen operating agents.

Everybody will agree that the average man is not as intelligent, as able, or as honest as the ablest, or the most intelligent, or the most honest. The individual fallibility of the average man will at once be conceded, but there are some people who seem to imagine that there is some mysterious virtue in mere numbers; that 10 men are necessarily more intelligent, more moral, and more honest than 1 man; that by adding together a thousand individuals, none of whom has ever gone beyond the multiplication table, some strange and weird transmutation results by which the combined mass is enabled to work out the most difficult problem in Euclid with the utmost accuracy. Thus, following out this highly intelligent theory, whenever one is anxious to have a message carried with the greatest haste from one part of the city to another, obviously the thing to do is employ not the fleetest messenger boy in the service, but arrange with 10 or a dozen average boys to unionize the job.

The distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] is perhaps the greatest living exponent of this doctrine. His recipe, roughly stated, I understand to be this: Take the voices of 10 foolish men, 20 ordinary men, 5 rascals, 16 good citizens, and 3 wise men (if any such can be induced to join); mix them all up together, with the result, vox populi, vox Dei. It was in some such flash of inspired wisdom that the learned Senator, in the course of a speech delivered in this Chamber a few weeks ago, presenting to us his now well-known and justly celebrated "composite citizen," said:

> The people can be trusted. The composite citizen knows more and acts from higher motives than any single individual, however great, experienced, or well developed. While selfishness is usually dominant in the individual, it is minimized in the composite citizen.

With growing confidence in this child of his creative genius, he next declares—evidently as the result of mature reflection, because the declaration constitutes one of the capitalized headings with which in his editorial capacity he has thoughtfully adorned his speech—that the

> "COMPOSITE CITIZEN IS UNSELFISH."

The Senator immediately proceeds under this caption to tell us how the gratifying transformation from distributive selfishness to collective altruism is brought about by a process as interesting as it is ingenious. I quote again:

> The composite citizen is made up of millions of individuals, each dominated in most cases by selfish interest. But because of the difference in the personal equations of the individual units making up the composite citizen there is a corresponding difference in the interests dominating said units.

Mr. President, let me pause long enough here to say that this is not a quotation from Herbert Spencer, though quite as lucid and convincing as anything that learned philosopher ever wrote. But listen further:

> And while composite action is taking place, friction is developed, attrition results, selfishness is worn away, and general welfare is substituted before action is accomplished.

I am unable to accept the frivolous suggestion advanced by some that this beautiful conception has been evolved from an overworked and hysterical inner consciousness; that friction and attrition can scarcely be expected to exercise an intelligent choice; and that what little general welfare there is in the combination to begin with is quite as likely to be worn away as selfishness. Solomon has told us that a fool may be brayed in a mortar with a pestle and his foolishness will not depart from him, but it evidently never occurred to that wisest of men that the result might have been far different if he had submitted a large number of fools to the process at that critical period while composite action was taking place. By a parity of reasoning a selfish citizen may be brayed in a mortar with a pestle and his selfishness will not depart from him, but contrariwise with a million selfish citizens. This aggregate selfishness may be entirely eradicated we are told, and general welfare—altruistic and delightful—wholly substituted by the simple application of friction and attrition while composite action is taking place. There are those who might become impatient if the process of regeneration should not become complete until the culmination of composite action, and so the learned Senator assures us "that general welfare is substituted before action is accomplished."

Mr. President, this is comforting as far as it goes, but I could wish—not for my own sake, but for others—that the information were a little more definite respecting the exact stage of the process at which selfishness retires and general welfare appears on deck. Otherwise there will remain in the minds of some a not altogether unjustified apprehension that the attendant friction and attrition may become more or less tedious pending the arrival of general welfare, should the otherwise joyous process of composite action be unduly prolonged. But, Mr. President, shall we stop here? If we may rid ourselves of selfishness by this comparatively easy and inexpensive method, surely other human frailties and shortcomings may be eradicated in like manner. "While composite action is taking place" let "friction and attrition" exert their benign and regenerative power to rid us of ignorance and egotism and class hatred, and at least modify in some degree the tendency toward a somewhat exasperating "holier than thou" attitude, which, I fear, is growing upon some of the disciples of my honored friend, though he remains, God be praised, wholly unspoiled by any such unfortunate tendency himself.

But, Mr. President, in spite of all the distinguished Senator from Oregon has said, certain of the unregenerate seem to regard the "composite citizen" as being somewhat oversaturated with the irresponsible idealism of the Oregon school of government by ballot. At least one has confessed to a feeling of skepticism respecting even his bodily existence, in spite of the fact that the honorable Senator has privately assured him that this child of his creative genius is actually in our midst, albeit so spiritually refined and so delicately illumined by the influence of the modern uplift that only the sensitive eye of the faithful may behold him, or the hand of the faithful touch him. To the unregenerate he reveals himself only to the ear as a "voice crying in the wilderness," proclaiming the wickedness and folly of the entire order of things established.

When the fullness of the new dispensation shall be upon us, it will be made clear that any scheme of things which has endured for a period exceeding six months and which has only the poor merit of having worked fairly well in practice is inherently worthless as a guide to the conduct of advanced people. In short, the "composite citizen" holds to the doctrine that mere experience is an ass and that common sense is outlawed by the statute of limitations. Legislatures are to be swallowed up in the initiative and referendum, courts obliterated by the recall, political parties juggled out of existence by the direct primary, and upon their ruins will rise the recently organized Progressive League—which, by the way, just now seems to be progressing after the manner of a woman getting off a car, with its back to the front—as the supreme guide, philosopher, and friend of the "composite citizen," whose offices its members will continue to joyously fill and whose salaries they will continue to cheerfully draw. Then, indeed, will the political millenium be in sight. Every social and political evil will be eradicated by the simple but effective expedient of voting it out of existence.

All the operations of government—lawmaking, law construing, law executing—will be merged in the one supreme, all-embracing function of balloting. We may confidently look forward to that halcyon era when there will be primary elections to nominate candidates for office, preprimary elections to designate persons to become candidates for nomination, and anteprepriminaries to frame an eligible list from which to select preprimary candidates to run the gauntlet of the primary itself, to the end that only the good and virtuous may compete for the final suffrages of the people. Having selected our candidates by this sifting and resifting and resifting series of primary elections, we will have election elections to determine who of these irreproachable persons shall become our officials, and then recall elections to get rid of them if we think on reflection that some undesirable material has slipped through a hole in the sieve. There will be elections to select lawmakers and elections to make laws for them; elections to select judges to construe laws and elections to determine whether we like the way they construe them; elections for men to execute the laws and elections to execute the executors if they do not execute to suit us. Mr. President, we can not have too much of a good thing. The "composite citizen," bearing upon his shield the inspiring device—

> Count that day lost whose low descending sun
> Views at thy hands no uplift voting done—

will unanimously and hilariously go into perpetual action. With nothing to do but feed and clothe a family of six or eight or ten hearty, growing children, the "composite citizen" will have no difficulty in snatching a few months of time here and there during the year to devote to these duties of progressive citizenship, and his spare moments can be utilized in reading, studying, digesting, and perhaps understanding a few volumes of proposed initiative and referendum legislation.

The "composite citizen," under the soothing influence of "friction and attrition," "while composite action is taking place," will embody all the virtues but none of the vices of the multitude from which he is compounded. An aggregate of more or less wise and more or less foolish, of more or less good and more or less bad, of more or less strong and more or less weak human atoms, he will himself be all wise, all good, all powerful. He will be the just man made perfect and the unjust man made perfect also.

I have been consulting the dictionary. Mr. Webster, whose vocabulary covered the whole linguistic field from which my honored friend from Oregon culls only the flowers, abruptly introduces the matter, as was his discursive habit, between two other wholly unrelated subjects, and treating the word "composite" as a botanical term, defines it thus: "Belonging to the order compositæ; bearing involucrate heads of many small florets, as"—the comparison is not mine, but that of the learned lexicographer—"as, for example, the daisy." The speech of the Senator from Oregon had prepared us to agree with Mr. Webster that his "composite citizen" was a "daisy," but we were in no mood for this sinister qualification, "bearing involucrate heads." After these glowing eulogies from the eloquent lips of the Senator to which we had listened, after these unqualified indorsements respecting the virtue, the unselfishness, the wisdom—ah, Mr. President! above all, the wisdom—of this paragon, must there finally creep into our hearts the foul suspicion that, after all, the "composite citizen" has something serious the matter with his head? Involucrate heads! Horribile dictu! The subject becomes painful. Let us inquire no further, but for better or worse, accept this creation of the inspired intellect of our honored friend simply as a "daisy with an involucrate head," and, closing the dictionary with all its brutal and disturbing bluntness of speech, voluntarily leave ourselves shrouded in deep, but merciful, ignorance respecting the exact nature of the affliction.

Mr. President, my objection to the initiative and the recall is without qualification. My objection to the referendum is not to that method as applied from the beginning in this country to the ratification or rejection of fundamental law or as applied to broad questions of public policy. What I object to is not its continued historical application, but its proposed hysterical extension to matters of general and detailed legislation. The Arizona constitution, so far as it refers to the referendum, provides that either the legislature or 5 per cent of the qualified electors may order the submission to the people at the polls of any measure or item, section, or part of any measure enacted by the legislature, except certain emergency laws, which are enumerated.

It is wise and proper that before a proposed constitution or constitutional amendment should go into effect it be adopted by a vote of the people. The constitution of a State contains the broad, underlying principles within the limits of which the various representative agencies of the people must act. The sovereign power rests only in the people and they alone should lay down the general principles according to which their representatives shall act and establish the boundaries beyond which they may not go; but under these principles and within these boundaries there is a mass of detailed work to be done that requires the continuous and sustained effort of somebody in order that it may be done well. The people as a whole have neither the inclination, the specialized training, nor the time requisite to enable them to master the thousand and one details necessary to qualify them to wisely discharge the functions of ordinary legislation. Men talk about the right of the people to make their own laws for their own government, and it tickles the fancy as a very high and noble sentiment, as it is, but it is a vain and idle performance to talk about the right to do a thing against the doing of which insuperable difficulties exist. To declare a general policy is a comparatively simple thing; to contrive the legislative machinery necessary to make the policy effective may be and often is an exceedingly complex and difficult task.

It is one thing to know that an evil exists and denounce it. It is quite another thing to put your finger on the cause of it, and still another to devise a remedy. After a late dinner you may have perfectly competent "inside information" that something has gone wrong, but be altogether unable to determine whether it was the wine or the cigar, the hot bird or the lobster salad, the olives or the pâté de foie gras. In such case you do not submit the matter to a referendum of the neighbors. You send for the doctor. All men, for example, may heartily agree as to the wisdom of regulating common carriers so as to insure fair and nondiscriminating treatment of all shippers and passengers, and the exaction of only fair and reasonable charges for services rendered. But, that much declared, we are only at the threshold of the difficulty. How shall it be done? What machinery shall be provided? There may be scores of divergent plans proposed. These are to be analyzed, compared, and contrasted, and in the end harmonized. There must be deliberate and intelligent interchange of views, the yielding of a detail here, the acceptance of a change there, amendment, and compromise. Such a process may call for weeks or months of laborious study, of careful sifting of conflicting claims as to law and fact, for technical knowledge, for investigation and thorough understanding of the preexisting legislation upon the subject. When all this is done and the law referred to the people to be adopted or rejected, how many will fit themselves to pass upon the question intelligently? Knowing that the law is to be submitted to the people, there will be a feeling on the part of the legislators that they have no responsible voice in the matter, but that the responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the electorate. Inevitably the same care in framing the proposed law will not be taken as where the final responsibility of enacting it into an enduring statute rests ultimately and alone upon the legislature itself. If an objectionable provision is found in the proposed law no method will exist, and in the very nature of things none can be devised by which the objectionable provision can be eliminated at the polls. There will be no choice but to adopt the bad provision for the sake of the good or to reject the good provision for the sake of avoiding the bad.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the Senator for a question and for a question only, because I want to get along.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to suggest to the Senator that possibly he has overlooked the fact that even in the initiative measures the legislature has the power of amendment or repeal. So, I ask the Senator if the objection which he is now urging is not answered by that proposition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may say to the Senator that he will find very few legislatures that will have the hardihood to repeal a law which has been adopted by a majority of the people.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They have not hesitated to do it in Oregon, where the law was ineffective in any particular.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And so one great objection to applying the referendum to matters of general legislation is that, however desirable or however imperative the need may be, no opportunity is afforded for mutual concession, or compromise of conflicting views, and amendment.

The weakening effect of the referendum upon the fitness and responsibility of the legislature was forcibly stated by Mr. Justice Johnson in the case of Johnson v. Rich (9 Barb., 686), where it was said:

> I regard it as an unwise and unsound policy, calculated to lead to loose and improvident legislation and to take away from the legislator all just sense of his high and enduring responsibility to his constituents and to posterity by shifting that responsibility upon others. Experience has always shown that laws passed in this manner are seldom permanent, but are changed the moment the instrument under which they are ratified has abated or reversed its current. Of all the evils which afflict a State, that of unstable and capricious legislation is among the greatest.

In the case of Barto v. Himrod (8 N. Y., 483, 496), Mr. Justice Willard, speaking upon the same subject, no less wisely and forcibly said:

> If this mode of legislation is permitted and becomes general, it will soon bring to a close the whole system of representative government, which has been so justly our pride. The legislature will become an irresponsible cabal, too timid to assume the responsibility of lawgivers, and with just wisdom enough to devise subtile schemes of imposture to mislead the people. All the checks against improvident legislation will be swept away, and the character of the Constitution will be radically changed.

The population of a State is not homogeneous throughout the State. There are, for example, sections devoted to agriculture, others to mining, others to manufacture, others to cattle and sheep raising, and so on. There is the division of our population between the great cities and the country. The advantage of the representative plan of legislation is that representatives are elected from these various sections so widely differing in their manner of living, in their habits of thought, and in their material interests. In the legislative assembly all these are represented, their views and interests heard and considered. In shaping laws of general application light is shed from all directions, the question is considered from every angle of vision. In the case of direct legislation the inhabitants of a city may look at a question in one way, those of the country in another. Farming sections may have one view, mining sections another, and manufacturing sections still another. If the city vote largely predominates in a State, it is the city view which is likely to prevail. If the rural vote predominates, it is the view of the country which will probably prevail, and legislation is more apt to reflect class interest and class prejudice than where consideration is given in a deliberative body where the views of all may be fairly and fully considered and harmonized.

A government of the people in a territory of vast extent, of large population, and of great and increasing diversity of pursuits and interests, can be administered only by a system of representation. It is almost as impossible for the people en masse under such circumstances to directly perform the various functions of government as it is for the human body in its entirety to perform the functions of the heart or the brain or the lungs. In a primitive state of society the one may be done, as in the most primitive forms of life the other may be done, but as society becomes complex and as the forms of animal life become complex special organs to discharge special functions are necessary.

Mr. Woodrow Wilson, in his very valuable book, "Constitutional Government in the United States," has expressed the thought clearly and forcefully. He says:

A government must have organs; it can not act inorganically by masses. It must have a lawmaking body; it can no more make law through its voters than it can make law through its newspapers.

Thus spoke the president of Princeton University, in the days of his tranquillity, before the microbe of political ambition had invaded his system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suppose the Senator has noticed that Mr. Woodrow Wilson has been candid enough to say that he has changed his mind?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had observed that, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But the Senator seems to be "standing pat."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That this view does not seem to be shared by the governor of New Jersey is one of the peculiarities of human psychology which I do not attempt to explain. I can only say that I prefer the calm, reflective judgment of the college president to the fevered hallucinations of the hopeful presidential candidate. Those who indorse his later utterances, reversing the ancient epigram, are simply appealing from Philip sober to Philip drunk.

Those who favor the initiative and referendum are in the habit of referring to the Swiss experiment with those methods. If it should be conceded—as it by no means can be—that the initiative and referendum are successful in Switzerland, the conditions in that country differ so radically from conditions here that it does not follow that they would be successful in the United States.

The Cantons in Switzerland are small in area and in population. The people are essentially homogeneous and conservative. Their legislative needs are few and simple. None of the legislative checks which exist under our system of government exist there. There is no executive veto, no judicial power of setting aside unconstitutional law, and there is only a single legislative chamber in each of the Cantons. But even under these conditions thoughtful men who have investigated the matter agree that more harm than good has resulted from their employment.

Mr. Wilson, already quoted, has given the subject very thorough and careful investigation. Speaking of the referendum, he says:

Where it has been employed it has not promised either progress or enlightenment, leading rather to doubtful experiments and to reactionary displays of prejudice than to really useful legislation.

He refers to the fact that in the Cantons of Zurich and Berne it led to the abolishment of wise health regulations; that in Federal legislation it was used only to aim a blow at the Jews under the guise of a law forbidding the slaughter of animals by bleeding. He says:

The vote upon most measures submitted to the ballot is usually very light; there is not much popular discussion, and the referendum by no means creates that quick interest in affairs which its originators had hoped to see it excite. It has dulled the sense of responsibility among legislators without in fact quickening the people to the exercise of any real control in affairs.

If it has thus failed in the comparatively simple affairs of small Switzerland, how much more dismal must be the failure in this country, with its vast and complex affairs.

The experience of every State in the Union where the referendum is in force, even as to constitutional amendments, is that, notwithstanding the comparative simplicity of the questions submitted, only about one-half or two-thirds of the people voting for candidates cast their votes for or against the proposed amendments. The remainder, from ignorance or indifference, do not attempt to pass upon the questions at all, and even of those voting it is safe to assume that no very large proportion have really taken the time to study and understand the questions submitted. I know from my own observation that of the persons who vote one way or the other many vote against proposed constitutional amendments because they have not taken the trouble to inform themselves as to the merits, and, on the other hand, many others vote for the amendments without understanding them and wholly on the strength of somebody's statement that they are all right. In a recent election held in South Dakota 13 proposed laws were submitted to the people under the referendum and every one of them was rejected at the polls, not because they were all bad, but because, as I am informed upon high authority, the mass of the people would not take the trouble to distinguish between the good and the bad, but voted against them all in utter disgust at the unwelcome task which they had been called upon to perform.

Attention has sometimes been called to the fact that direct legislation by the people is not a new thing. The New England town meeting has been cited as a case in point, but in these mass assemblies the people met face to face. There was opportunity for an interchange of opinion, for discussion, for the refining influence of deliberation and amendment. Those who, upon the one hand, favored the law, and those who, upon the other hand, opposed it, presented their views and assumed the responsibility for them.

This did not differ greatly from the process now in operation under our representative form of government, where the people, being so numerous that they can no longer meet and exchange their opinions, delegate their authority to agents, who assemble and publicly discuss their views, openly assume responsibility for them, and pass laws after full opportunity for discussion and amendment. The secrecy and the limitations of the ballot box are a poor substitute for these open and thoroughgoing methods.

In Mr. Wilson's work on "Constitutional Government in the United States," from which I have already quoted, he illustrates the difference between the judgment which men arrive at after a real interchange of views such as takes place in a deliberative assembly and the judgment which is likely to result under the initiative and referendum. He says:

Common counsel is not aggregate counsel. It is not a sum in addition, counting heads. It is compounded out of many views in actual contact; is a living thing made out of the vital substance of many minds, many personalities, many experiences; and it can be made up only by the vital contacts of actual conference, only in face-to-face debate, only by word of mouth and the direct clash of mind with mind.

All the objections which apply to the modern referendum apply with increased force to the initiative; and, in addition, there is the further objection that the proposed law is not even framed by any deliberative or responsible body. Under the Arizona constitution 10 per cent of the qualified electors are given the right to propose any measure and 15 per cent the right to propose any amendment to the constitution. A more sweeping and comprehensive repudiation of representative legislation could not well be imagined. Apparently the constitutional convention realized that perhaps they had gone too far, and so it was provided that initiative and referendum laws should not transcend the constitution. This provision itself shows the confusion of mind under which the framers labored, because to provide that an initiative law shall not transcend the constitution is of little avail when the constitution itself may be altered by an initiative amendment with equal ease and simplicity. Here there are no limitations, and therefore legislation of any character may be as readily tacked on to the constitution in the form of an amendment as it may be passed in the shape of ordinary law.

Under the initiative as thus provided proposed laws will, of course, frequently be drafted by a coterie or clique of interested persons, perhaps all of one way of thinking. It will not be considered and debated in public as legislative enactments are; there will be little, if any, opportunity for the consideration of opposing views in framing the law. The power of compromise, which is a necessity in the making of laws, will be wholly absent. There are certain radical reformers who decry all compromise as being a partial yielding to wrong. They recognize no middle ground and demand that we shall stand for the right without yielding the breadth of a hair.

But this is a mere begging of the question. Right and wrong in governmental matters are not always, indeed, not generally, divided by any sharp line which will enable us to put our finger upon one side and say this is exactly right and upon the other and say this is utterly wrong. The boundary between the two is a doubtful zone in which the extent of the uncertainty gradually diminishes as we proceed outwardly in either direction, until upon the one side we reach the clear field of indisputable right and upon the other of unmistakable wrong. But it is precisely in this middle ground of uncertainty—where honest people differ—that the deliberate interchange of conflicting opinion is necessary and the legislative function finds its field of greatest activity, and it is precisely here that the initiative would most signally fail, because the proposed law would be framed, not by those who see the situation from different angles, but by those who all occupy the same point of view. It is not difficult to obtain signatures to any petition, and the initiative petition will constitute no exception to the rule. Given an active, energetic, self-constituted committee, and 10 per cent of the voters of the State can be readily obtained to sign petitions proposing any kind of a law that anybody will want. Those who sign the petition—at least 10 per cent of the voters of the State—will be committed to it in advance; its sponsors will be active in advocating it; "what is everybody's business is nobody's business," and in all likelihood, after the novelty of the system has worn off, interest will largely disappear and very few people will be found who will take the trouble to combat even a foolish or bad provision. A very large proportion of the voters will refrain from voting at all upon the question, and under these conditions, with active and interested work done in behalf of the law and a half-hearted opposition, or none at all, the chances are altogether in favor of the adoption of more unwise laws than ever get through our legislatures.

In Oregon at the last election 32 laws were submitted, either under the initiative or the referendum provision of the constitution. These proposed laws, together with a few brief and meager arguments in favor of and against some of them, are contained in a pamphlet covering 202 closely printed pages, to be studied, digested, and thoroughly understood before intelligent action could be had, presenting to the people, busy with their own affairs, a most difficult, perplexing, and burdensome task; a task which, in the very nature of things, must have been performed by the great majority in the most perfunctory manner or not at all. These laws are upon all sorts of subjects. There is a bill prohibiting the taking of fish from the waters of Rogue River, which would seem to be a police regulation affecting a limited part of the State and with which the people in remote sections would not be sufficiently concerned to give the subject very laborious consideration. There are a number of bills to create new counties, to allow certain counties to pay additional salaries to their judges, of which the same may be said. Either at this election or a preceding one this somewhat peculiar situation was brought about. In the lower part of the Columbia River salmon fishing is carried on by means of nets; in the upper part by means of fish wheels. That, as I understand, is due to the current. In the lower part of the river the current is comparatively slight, while in the upper part of the river the current is much stronger. The net fishermen, being opposed to the wheels, proposed a law under the initiative prohibiting all fishing by wheels. The wheel fishermen, being opposed to net fishing, proposed a law prohibiting the taking of fish with nets. The matter being submitted to the wise and discriminating "composite citizenship" of that State, both laws were adopted by good round majorities, with the amiable result that thereby the taking of salmon by any effective method was prohibited altogether.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say that men who voted that way explain the situation in this way: That before that time the legislature had been protecting the fishermen, and the people by enacting both of these laws neglected the fishermen and protected the fish. That was the difference between the viewpoint of the legislature and the people. The result was that the fishing season was a closed one for the whole year and the States of Oregon and Washington then got together and enacted a uniform law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the legislature was protecting the fishermen, and the people did not want them protected.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They thought they would protect the fish, which had been neglected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the legislature had to come to the relief of the situation and pass a law which permitted fishing afterwards.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They compelled the legislature of Washington, Mr. President, to join with them in enacting a uniform code of law for the government of both sides of the river, which both legislatures before that time had refused to do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should think it might well have had that result.

A law proposing to compel railroad companies to give free passes to all public officials received nearly 30,000 votes out of a total of less than 90,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me call the Senator's attention to one thing in reference to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to go on.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will take but a moment, and then I will not interrupt the Senator again. I happened to be governor at the time a message was sent to the legislature advising the abolishing of the pass system. A bill was introduced into the legislature to abolish the pass system, but the legislature, instead of passing that law, changed it into a compulsory pass law; it was metamorphosed into a law compelling the railroad companies to issue passes to officials. That was taken before the people on a referendum, and the people repealed that law and enacted one abolishing the pass.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I was calling attention to was that in the State of Oregon 30,000 people, more than one-third of those voting, were found to vote for a law of that character.

A bill to create a "board of people's inspectors" was gravely submitted under the initiative by the People's Power League of Oregon, the board to consist of three persons to be selected in the first instance in the following highly popular manner. The executive committee of the State grange, the executive committee of the Oregon State Federation of Labor, and the presidents of the boards of trade and commercial organizations of Oregon were each to name three persons, and from each of these groups the governor was to select one for appointment. The people generally were not to be consulted. The "composite citizen" was notified to go on a vacation. It was made the duty of this board of censors "to have at least one of their number present at all times at every session of each house of the legislative assembly, and to be watchful for any defect or imperfection in the State and local systems of government." They were to watch the public officers and public institutions, the departments of the State and county and municipal governments, and to investigate and report on their management. They were imposing upon them a pretty large contract. All this was to be done, the proposed law naively provided, "without motive or desire for personal or partisan advantage." They were, moreover, "to be as fair and impartial to all citizens and officers as the supreme court seeks to be between parties to a suit." "As the supreme court seeks to be" is distinctly good. What the supreme court merely sought the censors for the people were bound under the mandate of the law to actually find and put into practical operation. They were to publish an official gazette not only of their own reports but also of any criticisms or complaints of their own official acts. These criticisms, however, under the law, are thoughtfully limited to not exceeding 200 words each; their own reports are to be without limit.

Reports by the governor, county officials, mayors of cities are to be published, but all of these are to be "brief and comprehensive." If they can not be made comprehensive without sacrificing brevity, we are not enlightened as to what shall be done. They are also to publish in this gazette a large number of other specific matters, and, finally, "other matters that they believe will promote the general welfare." Apparently there are to be no canvassing agents for this publication, the law directing that every registered voter who is either the head of a family or a member of no family shall be considered a subscriber, and the gazette mailed to him at public expense. The inhabitants of the benighted regions outside of Oregon must pay $1 a year in advance. It will be observed that every provision is made whereby the censors will watch everybody else and report their lapses, peccadillos, and shortcomings to the people, but, unhappily, no provision is made for watching or reporting upon the censors themselves. This unique piece of legislation, it must be borne in mind, was not proposed as a joke. The People's Power League of Oregon were as solemn about it as the Senator from Oregon has been in pointing out the virtues of the "composite citizen." Thirty thousand people in the State of Oregon voted for it, or considerably more than one-third of all those voting. A change of 11,000 votes would have carried it. When the State becomes truly progressive it probably will be carried. In the meantime the "composite citizen" must censor for himself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I assume that the Senator thinks that was a foolish and a bad law; does he not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, the people of Oregon——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think obviously foolish——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The people of Oregon showed by their vote that they agreed with you; and I think they showed by their vote that they agreed with the Senator from Utah on every law to which he has objected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am calling attention to the fact that a change of 11,000 votes would have put that law into operation. Why should the people of Oregon or of any other State be subjected to the burden of passing on a law of that kind, concocted by a thoroughly irresponsible body of men, published and put in this book at the expense of the State and circulated at great expense among the voters?

The People's Power League, however, proposed another law, which was adopted by a small majority, namely, the law providing for the election of delegates of the several political parties to their respective national conventions, every delegate so elected being entitled to receive from the State treasury the amount of his traveling expenses necessarily spent in attending the convention, not to exceed $200. Hereafter when any group of enterprising gentlemen may desire a pleasure trip at the public expense, all they will need to do will be to organize a party, call a national convention, and elect themselves delegates.

I should not like to suggest that any of these visionary schemes are being advocated by anybody from motives of self-interest, and yet that sort of thing sometimes happens in this cold and selfish world. I remember hearing of an individual who appeared before the common council of a certain city and in a fiery speech denounced a proposed ordinance restricting the speed of automobiles within the city limits as being a tyrannical and unwarranted invasion of the personal rights of the citizen. A councilman asked the objector how many automobiles he owned, to which he replied: "I don't own any. I'm an undertaker."

The excuse for the adoption of the initiative and referendum is that the people can no longer trust their representatives; that legislatures will not obey the popular will; that they are dishonest and corrupt and controlled by the interests. The initiative and referendum, therefore, proceeds upon the obvious fallacy that a democracy which has not the wisdom or the inclination to select honest and capable men to make laws can wisely perform the infinitely more complex and delicate function of making the laws directly. It would follow, I suppose, that any man who is incapable of selecting a competent physician would be thoroughly qualified to heal himself. The enduring basis of representative government is that it affords the opportunity for the whole people to select from among themselves those who can govern for them better than the people, because of their vast number and their other duties, can govern for themselves. For a people to confess their inability to do this is only short of confessing an inability to govern at all. Under the initiative and referendum it is not proposed to do away with our legislators; they are to continue. If, knowing that our legislators adopt laws for us in their final form, we still can not select capable men for the office, our inability will be intensified under the power to initiate laws for ourselves. If power is reserved by the people to pass a law which the legislature ignores, or to veto a law which the legislature passes, it will be argued the consequences of having dishonest or incapable legislators are not so serious, the need of care will not be so great, and the use of care in the selection of representatives will constantly diminish.

The referendum in the past has been confined to the adoption of organic law, and this has served to accentuate the vital difference between the constitution and ordinary legislation. If the referendum shall be applied to the making of law generally, the people will inevitably lose the high regard which they now have for their constitutions, and in the end the distinction between the organic law of the State and ordinary legislation will disappear. Constitutions are made not only for the purpose of confining the representative agents of the people within definite boundaries, but also for the purpose of preventing hasty, ill-considered, and unjust action on the part of the majority of the people themselves. The written constitution is the shelter and the bulwark of what might otherwise be a helpless minority. Tyranny is no less hateful in the hands of the people than in the hands of the despot, and the oppression of the minority by the majority is tyranny no less than is the arbitrary oppression of the king. The forward march of democracy will be of little avail if in the end it rescue us from the absolutism of the king only to hand us over to the absolutism of the majority. And so we provide that the government shall be administered by representatives who are to act not for a part of the people, but for all, thereby, in a sense, expressing our distrust in the hastily formed opinions of the temporary majority, but declaring our lasting confidence in the wisdom and the justice of the persistent majority. The demand for direct legislation by the people ignores this distinction and violates, if not the letter at least the spirit, of this constitutional compact.

It is the recall provision of the Arizona constitution, however, which, to my mind, is fraught with the greatest mischief. That provision, briefly stated, is that every elective officer in the State of Arizona is subject to recall by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which he was elected whenever such recall is demanded by a petition signed by electors equal to 25 per cent of the votes cast at the last preceding general election.

The grounds upon which the recall is based must be stated in not more than 200 words. The officer is given the alternative of resigning his office within five days after the filing of the petition. If he does not resign, a special election must be held not less than 20 nor more than 30 days after the making of an order to that effect. The reasons given in the petition for demanding the recall are to be set forth in the ballots, together with the officer's justification in not more than 200 words. Other candidates for the office may be nominated, to be voted for at said election, and the candidate receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected for the remainder of the term. No recall petition shall be circulated until the officer has held his office for a period of six months, except as to members of the legislature, in which case a petition may be circulated at any time after five days from the beginning of the first session following his election. After one recall petition and election, further petitions may be circulated and further recall elections held if the petitioners shall pay into the public treasury the expenses of the preceding election.

The power of recall, it is seen, includes all officials—legislative, executive, and judicial. Attempts have been made to show that the recall is not a new thing in this country, and we are referred to Article V of the Articles of Confederation, which reserved to each State the power to recall its delegates at any time within the year for which they were appointed and to send others in their place for the remainder of the year. Passing by the distinction between an officer elected by the people and a mere delegate appointed by a State to represent its interests in what was little more than a general convention, it is sufficient to say that the whole scheme of the Confederation was found to be so utterly ineffective that it was abandoned at the end of a few years, and the enduring National Government which we now have put into its place. The framers of the Federal Constitution evidently regarded the recall feature of the Confederation as an unwise precedent to follow, and it found no place in that great instrument, as for more than 100 years the ballot-box recall found no place in the plan of government of any State.

The inevitable tendency of the recall will be to give us a set of weak and spineless executive and legislative officials, no longer having the courage or the inclination to act upon their own initiative and responsibility, but with their ears always to the ground to catch the first indication of the popular drift in order to anticipate it. They will soon cease to distinguish between the settled, deliberate judgment of the people to which they should yield a willing obedience, and the passing whim of the moment, against which the ultimate best good of society may demand the assertion of a sturdy opposition. Such a provision, I firmly believe, is more likely to result in the recall of good officials than of bad ones, because the time-serving, unscrupulous politician will be swift to conform his action to every shifting opinion of his constituents, while the official of honesty and integrity and courage, who prefers his duty to his office, will stand for what he believes to be right and sound and wise, even though for the time being he may stand alone. It has happened very often that the governor of a State or the mayor of a city has incurred the violent opposition of a temporary majority by the announcement of a policy which, when put into operation, has been found to work to the advantage and upbuilding of the community. With the recall in existence, such an officer would have been swept out of office in response to a spasmodic impulse, afterwards found to be wholly unwarranted. It is far better in the long run that our public officials be permitted to serve out the short terms for which they are elected, unless they so conduct themselves as to become amenable to removal by impeachment or by punishment under specific provisions of law.

A republic has been well defined as "an empire of laws and not of men," and John Adams, who quotes this definition with approval (Adams's Works, vol. 4, p. 194), adds:

> That form of government which is best contrived to secure an impartial and exact execution of the laws is the best of republics.

The recall contemplates not an "empire of laws" to be executed with impartiality and exactness, but an empire of men who punish not according to some fixed and definitely prescribed rule, but according to their undefined, unrestrained, and unlimited discretion, conceived, it may be, in prejudice and delivered in careless ignorance of the facts, administered not in the sight of all men, but in the secrecy of the ballot box, where it can never be known whether the voter judged according to the poised and balanced scales of justice or struck with the knife of the assassin.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very briefly.

Mr. CLAPP. I know the Senator means to be fair. This speech will undoubtedly go to the country, and I think the last statement of the Senator should be qualified, that the recall and referendum have to be initiated in the open by men openly signing a petition. That would have been entirely ignored by the Senator's statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no. The Senator has not been following me or he would have observed that I had already stated that the petition is initiated in the open.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The men who sign the petition, of course, are known. I am speaking of the ballot box. The way in which the voter casts his ballot can not be known because it is a secret ballot.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire if the Senator thinks a secret ballot would be any more dangerous in passing on a law than in electing a candidate to execute the law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there can be no doubt that the recall is more dangerous. Men do not punish laws. They do not take revenge on laws. They may punish men or take revenge upon men.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am rather surprised that the Senator should take a position against the secret ballot.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Go on.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator from Utah has not said so in terms, but I should like to know whether his opposition goes to the direct primary or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not undertaken to discuss that here, but I will say to the Senator that if a direct primary system could be devised under which the votes only of the members of each party could be insured, I should have no objection to it. But I do not know thus far of any law which has been passed which accomplishes that result. But it is aside from my intention to discuss that. I have enough to do without going into that.

Mr. WORKS. I asked the question because I regard that as rather the most important feature of the reforms which are being urged, and one which might make others unnecessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I regard it as the least objectionable.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Montana will not interrupt me. It is very warm, and I am already tired.

Mr. DIXON. I will not interrupt the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah indicates an indisposition to yield.

Mr. DIXON. I think when the Senator hears what I have to say he will be glad to yield.

I have been very much interested in the discussion. This is one of the live, important questions which confront this country. Certainly the spirit represented here by urging the Senator not to yield to interruptions is not in conformity with the usual proceedings in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator on his feet is the best judge of what shall be done.

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already indicated that I preferred to go on without being interrupted. The Senator himself will bear me out and every Senator here that I always gladly yield to interruptions.

Mr. DIXON. I say the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But to-day the weather is oppressive, and I do not want to prolong this speech any longer than I am obliged to.

Mr. DIXON. Interruptions contribute to the illumination of the speech——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The illumination can come along later.

It is sometimes said that if people can be trusted to elect and reelect officers with fairness they can be relied upon to administer the recall with fairness. The two powers are essentially different. We elect one man and defeat another, not because the one defeated is bad or unfit, but because the man elected is preferred for reasons which may be wholly aside from the merits of the respective candidates. Such a defeat carries with it ordinarily no reflection upon the ability or the integrity of the defeated. But to recall an official is a declaration of his unfitness, and carries with it reproach and dishonor. When an official seeks reelection the people pass upon his record as a whole, not merely upon some isolated act. Under the recall he occupies the position of an accused defendant seeking to avoid condemnation, and the attention of the people is concentrated upon the particular acts complained of, and his record, taken as a whole, receives little consideration. The difference between being rejected at an election and being recalled is the difference between not receiving an invitation to enter at the front door and being kicked out of the back door in disgrace. The recall necessarily involves the exercise of judgment respecting the rightfulness or wrongfulness of official conduct. The whole genius of our institutions demands that before a decision of this character shall be effected there shall be an opportunity to confront the accusers and to hear the accusation according to the settled and orderly methods of the law, and that judgment, after a full hearing, shall be rendered by an impartial tribunal. Anything less than this, whatever it may be called, is in essence nothing but lynch law. The people themselves will soon lose all regard for a representative who "lives and moves and has his being" in the fear of their spasmodic punishments.

While I thoroughly disapprove of the initiative and the modern referendum and the recall as applied to executive and legislative officers, I could well subordinate my judgment to that of the people of Arizona if they had not gone further and provided that the recall should embrace the judiciary as well. The power to recall a judge who renders an unpopular judgment is to my mind so utterly subversive of the principles of good government that I can never get my own consent to withhold my condemnation and disapproval of it.

The Senator from Oregon—not the father of the "composite citizen," but the junior Senator, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN—in his speech of April 17 last, asks:

> But as an abstract proposition, why should a judicial officer be independent of the wishes of his constituents?

Ah, Mr. President, much of the vice and fallacy of the argument for the right to recall judges rests in this assumption that the judge, like a Congressman or a legislator, represents a constituency. What is a constituent? He is a person for whom another acts. A constituent implies as a necessary corollary, a representative who speaks for him. A judge has no constituents; he is only in a restricted sense a representative officer at all. The people who elect him can with propriety make known their wishes only through the laws which they enact. The judge is the mouthpiece of the law. His constituents are the statutes duly made and provided. If his decisions are wrong, the remedy is to appeal to a higher court—not to the people. The scales of justice must hang level or there is an end of justice. The recall puts into the scale, upon one side or the other, in every case where strong public feeling exists, the artificially induced anxiety of the judge for the retention of his place. Bound by all the sacred traditions of his office to decide impartially between the parties according to the law and the evidence, he begins the discharge of his high duties with a personal interest in his own decision.

The judge represents no constituents, speaks for no policy save the public policy of the law. If he be not utterly forsworn, he must at all hazards put the rights of a single individual above the wishes of all the people. He has no master but the compelling force of his own conscience. Every circumstance which diminishes his independence and his courage, which closes his ears to the righteousness of the cause and opens them to the voice of clamor, makes for injustice.

If charged with incompetency, dishonesty, or corruption, common fairness demands that he should be tried in the open before an impartial tribunal, where he may be heard, not with a limitation of 200 words upon his defense, but in full, and where he may face his accusers and test the truth of their accusations by those orderly methods of procedure which the experience of centuries has demonstrated are essential to the ascertainment of truth. But the recall institutes a tribunal where everybody decides and nobody is responsible; where at least 25 per cent of the membership have already, as the judge's accusers, prejudged his case, and from whose arbitrary and unjust findings there is no appeal. In such a forum idle gossip and village scandal stand in the place of evidence; assertion takes the place of sworn testimony; and the foulest lie goes unchallenged by the touchstone of cross-examination. The voter will make up his verdict of vindication or conviction under the illuminating radiance of the torchlight procession, in the calm, judicial atmosphere of the brass band and the drum corps, and upon the logical summing up of the spellbinder and the campaign quartet.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who have become impatient at the restraints and checks and safeguards of the representative form of government and the written Constitution. I am not one of those who would launch the ship of state, with every sail set, upon the wide sea of tossing waters—with all its unsounded depths and unknown shallows, with here a whirlpool and there a half-submerged rock—without a chart or a compass or a rudder or an anchor, trusting alone to the merciful chance of wind and wave and the tumultuous efforts of an uncaptained crew to preserve it from disaster. I disagree utterly with the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who told us a few days ago in that calm, judicial way of his, that the Constitution of the United States—for which some of us had conceived a rather high opinion—was all wrong; that it was not sufficiently democratic; that it was so drawn by Madison and those who were in the Constitutional Convention as to vest unfair power in the hands of the minority, and that this principle shows from one end of it to the other; that, among other things, to his deep regret, he had been unable to discover in that worn and antiquated document any provision for the recall of the Supreme Court of the United States. There are some individuals in this country who ought to be prosecuted for monopolizing so much of the wisdom that a discriminating Providence intended should be distributed in modest proportions among a somewhat extended number of people. I do not mean to say that the Senator from Oklahoma is one of these, but I feel sure that it was a distinct misfortune that he did not make his appearance at a date sufficiently early to give the fathers who framed the Constitution the benefit of his counsel and advice. I am not certain that in that event the Constitution would have been better, but I am sure it would have been longer than it is. At any rate, it is a great pity that the Senator from Oklahoma could not have been privileged to point out at that time the high-handed disregard of its framers for the rights of the people which he points out with such conclusive finality now.

For a century and a quarter the great names of Washington, who was the president of the convention; of Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, Robert Morris, James Madison, James Wilson, Charles Pinckney, Rufus King, and all the others of the immortal list, have occupied a shrine of glory in the hearts of the misguided multitude as the framers of a Constitution which, instead of being undemocratic "from one end of it to the other," is inspired "from one end of it to the other" with the thought that the day when the king commands and the people obey has gone, and that the new day has risen when the people shall command and the king obey.

But we have all been mistaken. The fathers, in framing the Constitution, were unpatriotic and undemocratic. They were engaged in turning over an amiable majority to the mercy of a ferocious minority; in setting up a government that could not be overturned by every breath of popular emotion; in creating a responsible and independent judiciary; and in other similar unholy and reprehensible enterprises, for which, I have no doubt, the enlightened "composite" citizenship of Oklahoma would, if they had the opportunity, commit them to the county jail as a gang of nonprogressive, standpat aristocrats.

Against these criticisms of the Constitution by this American Senator I would put the strong words of the great English commoner, who described it as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." Against the petulant view of this American Senator, that this learned, courageous, and patriotic court should be made responsive, by means of the recall, to the changing moods of the majority, I would set the vigorous statement of another Englishman, Mr. Bryce, who said:

> The Supreme Court is the living voice of the Constitution; that is, of the will of the people expressed in the fundamental law they have enacted. It is, therefore, as some one has said, the conscience of the people, who have resolved to restrain themselves from hasty or unjust action by placing their representatives under the restriction of a permanent law. It is the guaranty of the minority, who, when threatened by the impatient vehemence of a majority, can appeal to this permanent law, finding the interpreter and enforcer thereof in a court set high above the assaults of faction.
> To discharge these momentous functions the court must be stable, even as the Constitution is stable. Its spirit and tone must be that of the people at their best moments. It must resist them the more firmly, the more vehement they are. Intrenched behind impregnable ramparts, it must be able to defy at once the open attacks of the other departments of the Government and the more dangerous, because impalpable, seductions of popular sentiment.

Against all such wild and visionary demands for the popular recall of the judges I would print in letters of living light the strong words of Chief Justice Marshall:

> The judicial department comes home, in its effects, to every man's fireside; it passes on his property, his reputation, his life, his all. Is it not to the last degree important that he should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to influence or control him but God and his conscience?

Sir, I hope I am not given to overextravagant statement, but I declare my solemn conviction that the moment a provision for the recall of the judges of the Supreme Court shall be written into the Federal Constitution, that moment will mark the beginning of the downfall of the Republic and the destruction of the free institutions of the American people.

And now, Mr. President, what is to be the next step in the onward march? Will it be to apply the referendum to judicial matters? Why not? If laws can be made by the simple formula of counting heads at the ballot box, why not laws construed and questions of fact unraveled by the same infallible method?

Such a device would seem to be the fitting complement of the recall. When a court is confronted with a particularly perplexing case in which there is great popular interest and warm public feeling, where the precedents of the law and the sentiment of the people are both conflicting, and the poor judge is driven to his wits' end to harmonize the one and accurately interpret the other, instead of putting him to the uncomfortable alternative of rendering a judgment which, however satisfactory to himself, may not meet the preponderating fancy of the multitude, surely he might have the benefit of the ballot-box opinion before instead of after he has decided. This may result in more or less disappointment to the losing litigant; it will result in a good deal of uncertainty respecting the law, but the judge will be saved and the power of the people vindicated.

Sir, the suggestion is not so fanciful as it may at first appear. In the wild witches' dance which is only just beginning the nimble feet of the "composite citizen" seem destined to cut livelier capers and more bewildering pirouettes than even this. An enterprising district attorney in southern California has already proposed to submit to the taxpayers of the county, if a way can be found, the question as to whether he shall further prosecute a case of arson in which the jury has already twice disagreed, upon which proposition the editor of the San Diego Herald comments in the following deplorably heterodox language:

> THE REFERENDUM.
> District Attorney Utley, in the Schoneck case, has made a wonderful proposition to the people of San Diego. After admitting his inability to secure a conviction, he asks the people to instruct him as to his duty. This sounds more like the utterance of a cunning politician than the words of a man.
> If Schoneck is innocent, the district attorney should not try to convict him. If he is guilty and the evidence is procurable, the case should be fought to a finish at any cost. If the district attorney feels that the man is guilty, but that it is impossible to procure evidence to convict, then he will do his duty and save the taxpayers much cost by dismissing the case. It is a matter wholly in the hands of the district attorney, and a man of caliber in that office would use his own judgment in the matter.
> It may seem like a delicate compliment to refer the matter to the people, but it really looks cowardly. Of course, an official who has made frequent blunders which the people are not slow to criticize may be overly sensitive and therefore may take such a course, thinking it may satisfy the public.

Those who are so intemperately appealing to the people to take over the direct management of their government, with its multiplicity of detail and difficulty, the successful operation of which demands concentration of effort and thoroughness of application, are preparing the way for future mischief. They are advocating a political creed alluring to the imagination, but utterly impossible of successful realization, and which, if adopted, will lead us more and more into the domain of the impracticable, with political chaos or political despotism as the ultimate result. It is the old contest between idealism and stubborn, matter-of-fact reality. It is the story of the philosopher's stone over again—the dream of transmuting all the metals into gold—the hunt for the master key that will open all locks, however different in size and shape—the problem of fitting square pegs into round holes—the puzzle of how to eat one's cake and have it—the search for the chimera of perpetual motion—the quest for the mythical pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow—and all the other impossible undertakings which have vexed men's souls and turned their brains and filled the lunatic asylums since mankind was divided into those who see facts and those who see visions. Finally, this latest delusion of having everybody drive the horses and everybody ride in the coach at the same time must share the fate of all the others, for it is now as it has always been, that the pursuit of the unattainable is the most profitless of human occupations.

Under the initiative and referendum the people will occasionally get a law they want which the legislature will not not pass; under the recall they will occasionally get rid of a man who never should have been elected; but under the system they will in the end get legislators that no thoughtful people ought to have and judges whom no free people should be satisfied with. The legislators will be driven to yield their own function of deliberation and their own independent judgment as to what is wisest and best and become mere recording agents. The executive officers will become less and less self-reliant men and more and more automatic machines, until some day, in the face of some great crisis, the people will awake to the affrighted realization that their government is in the hands of men who have lost the courage and the wisdom to act upon their own responsibility at all.

Mr. President, in the main and in the long run changes which come by the gradual and orderly processes of evolution are better and far more enduring than those brought about by the spasmodic methods of revolution. Experience is a safer guide than prediction. The tree is known by its fruits rather than by its blossoms, for sometimes the fairest blooms, like the fairest promises, produce no fruit at all. The rules of government that have been tried, that have been rounded into shape by years of practical use, that have stood the strain and pressure from every direction, are not to be lightly cast aside in order that we may put high-sounding experiment in their place. The strength and the glory of the common law, which is but the crystallized common sense of the clear-thinking English race expressed in definite form, is that it has been gradually developed by hundreds of slow years of application to the diverse and changing needs of society, until it has become fitted and molded and adjusted to all the conditions of life. And so, sir, with the great principles of our Government. Like the common law, they are a growth, not an invention. Year by year they have developed in enduring strength, striking their roots deeper and deeper into the intimate life of the people. They have withstood the specious opposition of the doctrinaire and the theorist, as well as the open shock of armed conflict. The preservation, the renewal, the strengthening of the old faith in their efficiency and virtue I regard as essential to our continued development along sane and symmetrical lines.

If the visionary and the dreamer, the agitator and the demagogue, could succeed in tearing them from the stately edifice of constitutional government, which, builded by the wise and loving hands of the fathers and cemented by the blood of the Civil War, has proven the sure refuge and shelter of all our people throughout the years in time of stress and trial, no man can foresee what miserable and inadequate makeshifts might be set in their place. Mr. President, I look with grave apprehension upon the present-day tendency to overturn, uproot, and destroy these vital and fundamental principles of representative government under which we have made and are making the most wonderful moral, social, and material advancement mankind has ever beheld. But, sir, I preach no gospel of despair. My sure confidence rests in the saving grace of the sober second thought of the American people, for, in the last analysis, we are a practical and a conservative people, sometimes, it is true, dreaming with our heads in the clouds, but always waking to the realizing sense that we must walk with our feet upon the earth. Sometimes the haunting spell of the darkness is upon us, but in the end the night goes, "the dawn comes, the cock crows, the ghost vanishes"; we open our eyes and all the uneasy and terrifying visions disappear in the light which fills the east with the glowing promise of another morning.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I submit the following proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Wednesday, July 19, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, etc., and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on the said day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the pending amendment, if there be any, upon any amendments that may then be offered, and then upon the bill itself, through the various parliamentary stages, to its final disposition. Further——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire what day is fixed in the order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The 19th.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The 19th of July?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The 19th of July. Does the Senator from West Virginia make the whole request as one proposition?

Mr. WATSON. As one proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 20, 1911, following the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, the farmers' free-list bill, so called, and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on the said day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the pending amendment, if there be any, upon any amendments that may then be offered, and upon the bill itself, through the parliamentary stages, to its final disposition before adjournment on the said day.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, July 21, 1911, following the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool, and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on the said day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, upon any amendment or amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill itself, through all its parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that these requests are coupled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are submitted as one request.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is impossible to agree to the request at this time. I do not think it will be very long before a vote will be had upon the reciprocity bill, but as is well known, there are the amendments which are to be proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and the amendments which are to be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has given a great deal of time to the preparation of the amendments which he will offer; and I can not, in his absence at least, consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. LODGE. I was about to ask the Senator from Iowa if he would withhold his objection for a moment. That is a long request for consent. I believe that it contains nothing but an agreement to vote on the reciprocity bill, the wool bill, and the farmers' free-list bill. I am in favor personally of making an agreement to vote on all those bills and I do not care how soon it is made. But it is too long a consent to be agreed to now. I assume, of course, that it will be printed in the RECORD, so that we will have an opportunity to discover its full scope.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Having been read, of course it will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, we have heard a great many very clever explanations as to why we should not vote on the bill pending. Ninety-nine per cent of the people of this country want the Senate to vote on these bills and get away. I want to give notice that the request which was made and was objected to will be made by me on every occasion until it is settled.

Mr. CLAPP. Would the Senator, the next time he offers his unanimous-consent proposition, put the wool bill—the wool schedule having been declared as the iniquitous schedule of the present law—ahead of the Canadian reciprocity bill and also put the farmers' free-list bill ahead of the Canadian tariff bill?

Mr. WATSON. I will if that can be agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Here is one who will agree to it.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments to the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is an amendment lying on the table which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa now offer the amendment to which he refers?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19 it is proposed to strike out, on line 23, the word "namely," and to insert:

And that the articles immediately following the proviso on page 9, upon which existing duties are reduced, being the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), when imported therefrom into the Dominion of Canada, are admitted into the Dominion of Canada when from the United States upon the payment of duties not in excess of the duties prescribed in this bill therefor.

Also to strike out the word "namely," on page 9, line 4, and add the following:

And that the articles immediately following the proviso on page 19, being the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, are admitted into the Dominion of Canada when imported from the United States free of duty, as herein prescribed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, unless Senators have carefully applied this amendment to the bill as it is they will not be able to understand it by the mere reading of its phraseology. I remarked the other day that this bill, as it is now drawn, presents to Canada the option of accepting our dutiable list without accepting our free list, or of accepting our free list without accepting the dutiable list; in other words, Canada can take her part of the bargain, if she cares to do it, and not take that part of the bargain which it is assumed gives us some advantage. I have not the least idea that there is any Senator here who would care to amend the bill, no matter if that is its form. Therefore, I submit the amendment, but do not ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, is it the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania to ask for a vote on the bill now?

Mr. PENROSE. If there is no one to address the Senate, we ought to vote on the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what is the purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as to presenting his amendments. I know that he has them in course of preparation. I know that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has prepared an amendment, but he is just now somewhat incapacitated with rheumatism or some other trouble of that character. I have no authority to speak for either of them, but I doubt whether a vote on the bill should be asked for in the next five minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to inconvenience any Senator or to take advantage of any Senator's absence; but in view of the refusal to fix a day for voting on this measure and in view of the unwillingness of the two Senators referred to, or any other Senator, to extend the courtesy to the Senate of giving notice as to when they would be prepared to address the Senate, I do not see that this body has any other alternative than to proceed with the consideration of the measure, even if that should require a vote to-day or to-morrow upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I only present the situation. I am not authorized, of course, to ask on behalf of either of those Senators any indulgence whatever, but I know the Senator from Kansas is in the restaurant below eating his lunch.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Lodge	Reed
Bailey	Curtis	McCumber	Root
Borah	Dixon	McLean	Shively
Bourne	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Brandegee	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Myers	Smoot
Brown	Gore	Nelson	Stone
Bryan	Gronna	Newlands	Swanson
Burnham	Guggenheim	Nixon	Thornton
Burton	Heyburn	Oliver	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Warren
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Watson
Clapp	Jones	Penrose	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Perkins	Williams
Crane	Lippitt	Pomerene	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I was detained at my lunch when the call for a quorum was made. I inquire if the Canadian reciprocity bill is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have an amendment that I am desirous of presenting and addressing the Senate upon, but physically I do not feel just able to go on to-day.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, Mr. President, to test the good faith of those interested in this matter, I will ask that the following request be read to the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania presents a request, and asks unanimous consent that it may be agreed to. The Secretary will state the request to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Monday, July 24, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes; and at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, without further debate, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Wednesday, July 26, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place upon the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, sewing machines, salt, and all other articles; and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, without further debate, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Thursday, July 27, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, without further debate, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRISTOW. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to state that my objection is not because I desire to protract the session; it is not because I expect in any way to unduly delay the consideration of the reciprocity bill, but it is because I do not believe that the three measures referred to in the request and the amendments that may be offered thereto can be properly discussed in the time allotted.

I do not understand that the reciprocity bill is the only measure that is before this session of the Senate for consideration; and, so far as I am concerned, I expect to oppose any adjournment of Congress until all three of the bills referred to have been discussed and voted upon, together with other amendments to the tariff law and other bills now in process, so we are informed, of formation in the House of Representatives, which will come to us later.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator from Kansas object to fixing a time to vote on the reciprocity bill if that were separated from the other propositions in the request made by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRISTOW. I would have to object at this time to that, because I would want to confer with some Senators who are not in the Chamber at present as to just how much time they think they need to discuss the reciprocity measure.

There is a bill, which the Committee on Territories has directed its chairman to report, favoring the admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union as States. For one, I do not think that Congress should adjourn before that measure has been acted upon. There is a bill pending before the Senate now to which, I believe, an amendment has been offered, which might be termed a corrupt-practices act, which was laid before the Senate a few weeks since at the request of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. It seems to me that that bill ought to receive the consideration of the Senate before adjournment.

Why there should be such a determination to force the consideration of the reciprocity agreement now at the inconvenience of Senators who want to be heard upon it and no consideration be given to the other important measures, it is difficult to understand, unless it has been agreed, as the public press has stated, that as soon as the reciprocity bill has been voted upon Congress is to adjourn.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. Unless I misunderstood the Senator in his enumeration of the bills that have been reported, are on the calendar, and that should receive attention, he overlooked the bill for the apportionment of Representatives.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think that bill slipped my mind. I think that should receive the consideration of the Senate. It has passed the House of Representatives and it has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Census, as I understand.

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; and it was passed by a Republican House at the last session. It has passed the Democratic House at the present session. It is the one of all these bills which we are under a special constitutional obligation to consider, relating, as it does, to the apportionment of Representatives under the census. It is a bill to execute the principal one of the only two purposes for which the Constitution authorizes the taking of the decennial census.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to that matter.

Why it should be necessary to insist upon long hours and immediate consideration of the reciprocity measure when Senators are not ready to discuss some phases of it, and to give no consideration to this other legislation, which in the judgment of many of us is equally important, I can not understand, unless, as I have said before, it has been agreed that these measures shall not be considered at this extra session.

I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on Finance that I was not expecting to take up an amendment that I have on the table to-day, but, if he insists, I will endeavor to get ready as rapidly as I can and occupy the time. It would, however, be a very great favor to me if I could take that up in the morning, because of a physical ailment that I have had for a few days that has prevented me from getting ready.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to speak at this time, I will offer and ask for a vote on my amendments. I offer, first, as a separate and independent section what is known as the free-list bill, and when that has been disposed of I shall offer the amendment which embodies the wool bill, substantially as it passed the House of Representatives. I prefer that these amendments should be voted on before I attempt to address the Senate on the main question, because if they are adopted they will so far mitigate the evils of the agreement with Canada that I may not care to speak further upon the question.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the pending bill contains three sections, I offer as a fourth section the amendment which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section at the end of the bill, to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough, and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Does he offer this as one amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. I offer it as one amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Is this the same as it passed the House?

Mr. BAILEY. Exactly, except that I have eliminated all of the agricultural products. I have regarded this as an effort to provide the farmer some compensation for the sacrifices which he is required to make by the Canadian reciprocity agreement, and I hardly thought it was fair to include with the small compensation which this affords the further sacrifice of his market as against the world, and instead of making it a free list for the farmer and against the farmer, I have made it a free list entirely and only for the farmer. It proposes for the free list nothing which he sells, and all the articles now embraced in it are articles which he buys.

As this bill places many of our most important agricultural products on the free list, as against the farmers' most effective competitor, I do not think it necessary for me to detain the Senate in arguing that the implements with which he must cultivate his fields ought to be exempted from all duties. Nor does it seem incumbent upon me to say much in defense of the boot, shoe, and leather provision of the amendment, because, as hides are now on the free list, all articles made out of them should be dealt with according to the same rule. It is not fair and just that the farmer or the ranchman should sell his hides in an open market free of all tax, and then be compelled to pay a tax on them when he buys them back in the shape of boots or shoes or harness.

I know, of course, that when hides were put on the free list we were promised that all of our people, including our farmers and cattlemen, should have the benefit of cheaper shoes, and we were assured that, notwithstanding the enormous loss which our farmers and graziers would incur in consequence of the diminished price which they received for their hides, they would be reimbursed by the smaller prices which they would be compelled to pay for their shoes and other leather products. But the Payne-Aldrich law, which placed hides on the free list, has now been on the statute books for almost two years, and I do not think that any Senator on either side of this Chamber will venture to stand in his place and declare that the promise of cheaper shoes and cheaper harness has been fulfilled. There have been some slight reductions on certain grades of leather products, but those reductions have been forced by the reduced duties on those particular products, and not by the repeal of the duty on hides; and even those reductions have not reached the great mass of consumers, and never will. We all know that now, and I think most of us knew it when we repealed the duty on hides. I can not bring myself to believe that any man with ability enough to secure an election to the United States Senate could have been misled on that question, because it could be decided by such a short and simple calculation. Some good people outside of Congress who had no access to the facts and who had not given close attention to the subject might have believed that free hides meant cheaper shoes, but I do not think that any Senator or Representative in Congress could have expected that result.

There was practically no dispute about the fact that the difference in the cost of making a pair of shoes out of hides which had paid a duty at the rate of 15 per cent and the cost of making a pair of shoes out of hides which had paid no duty at all was less than 5 cents a pair. I have never heard the difference estimated at more than 7 cents a pair, and the better opinion is that it amounts to less than 5 cents a pair. I can not bring myself to believe that any Member of this body seriously thought that this 5 cents could be divided between the shoe manufacturer, the wholesale shoe merchant, the retail merchant, and then have any left for the man who buys and wears the shoes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I call the Senator's attention to a statement made in debate by our new leader, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], on this particular subject, because I think the Senator from Texas might want to modify his declaration that no Senator entertained that view.

This solicitude for the farmer is, of course, extremely touching. Nevertheless, the packers are managing their business in their own way and looking out for themselves, as anyone else would do.

It has been maintained here that the removal of the duty would make no difference in the price of shoes. There has been a good deal of argument on that point. I take it that if the tariff raises the price of the hides it raises the price of leather and shoes as well, and if the price of hides will be lowered by a removal of duty the price of shoes and leather will be similarly affected. The average rise in the price of leather in a pair of shoes ascribed to the tariff on hides would be from 2 to 8 cents. Some say it would be from 6 to 9. If it is true that the tariff does raise the price of hides and of leather, that is an amount sufficient to be taken into account.

To show how prophecies are sometimes answered by time, at the time we passed the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill we were receiving about $2,000,000 as revenue from hides. By putting hides upon the free list we lost the revenue to the Government of some $2,000,000. In the meantime the price of shoes instead of being lowered has in fact gone up and the price of hides has gone down.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Ohio in that extract, as in a more recent utterance, confuses two different things. He argues that if taking the duty off of hides will reduce the price of hides, then taking the duty off of hides will reduce the price of shoes. That is a non sequitur. Taking the duty off of hides will reduce the price of hides, but we must take the duty off of shoes to reduce the price of shoes.

Mr. BORAH. On rereading this, I think the Senator from Ohio was not perhaps arguing that it would lower the price of shoes so much as to prove that the farmer would be again touched.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Ohio has recently manifested very pronounced symptoms of the political disease known as the doctrine of free raw material, and he applies it with great resoluteness and great firmness everywhere except in Ohio.

Mr. President, we were also told in that debate, and we hear the same assertion now with respect to other farm products, that the removal of the duty on hides would not affect the farmer, but would only take something from the Beef Trust; but if you will go among the farmers and ask them whether the removal of that duty has reduced the price of their hides, ninety-nine out of every hundred will tell you that it has, and the one who tells you otherwise does not understand this question. If the Democratic Party is right in its position on the tariff question, then it is undoubtedly true that whenever we repeal the duty on any article the price of that article diminishes by approximately the amount of the duty repealed.

No man will deny that as to the article actually imported. No man will deny that if I buy hides in Argentina or in Mexico and am permitted to import them into the United States without the payment of a duty on them those hides laid down at my tannery will cost me less by the amount of the duty than they would if I had been compelled to pay the duty. That far there is no disagreement between Democrats or Republicans. And the whole disagreement, so far as any disagreement exists at all is as to the effect of a duty on the price of the domestic article.

No opinion is more firmly or more clearly fixed in the mind of a Democrat than that a duty on any competing article not only increases the cost of the imported article, but increases the cost of the domestic article as well. I believe that, and I have been asserting it ever since I could find an audience to hear me discuss the tariff question. Believing it, Mr. President, I have lived up to it, and I vote according to it without variableness or shadow of turning.

If it be true, sir, that the repeal of the duty on hides has reduced the price of hides, then that single act of the Sixty-first Congress has cost American agriculture an enormous sum. We kill more than 5,000,000 cattle every year at the principal markets alone, and at a difference of $1.50 per hide, which is a most conservative estimate, it has made a difference to our farmers and ranchmen of more than $7,500,000. Where, Mr. President, has that vast sum gone? The men, women, and children who buy and wear shoes have not obtained the benefit of it. Not only, sir, have the $7,500,000 lost by the American farmers and ranchmen gone into the pockets of the leather manufacturers, but the $2,200,000 revenue formerly collected by the Public Treasury has gone to the same beneficiaries. We collected the year before the Payne-Aldrich law took effect, in round numbers, $3,000,000 on imported hides. Of that amount we paid out more than $700,000 in drawbacks. But with those drawbacks paid, that duty netted the Public Treasury a revenue of more than $2,200,000. What, sir, has become of it? The Government no longer collects it. The importers of hides formerly paid it, but they no longer pay it; and the whole of it, or practically all of it, has gone to swell the magnificent fortunes of our rich manufacturers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Texas give some figures to prove his statement that taking the duty off of hides resulted in a reduction in the price of hides?

Mr. BAILEY. I did not suppose that any figures were necessary to prove that statement, but if the Senator from Nebraska doubts it, I think I can make it plain to him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My recollection of the market was that for the year following the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill, which placed hides upon the free list, the price was actually advanced, and a glance which I have just taken at the Statistical Abstract published by the Government bears out that statement.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a fact; but it does not in the least contradict what I have said.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the taking off of the tariff on hides did not cause a reduction in the price of hides, as the Senator from Texas has stated.

Mr. BAILEY. But it did. The Senator treats the question as if there was no cause operating on the price of hides except the tariff.

The fact is that, notwithstanding the repeal of the duty which reduced the price of hides, there were other influences which counteracted that effect, and resulted in temporary increase of price; but the Senator must know that the inevitable effect of repealing the duty on hides was to reduce their price, and the fact that the price did not actually fall below what it had been was due to some other and counteracting cause. Congress reduced the duty on shoes at the same time it repealed the duty on hides, and yet the price of shoes advanced. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit a Republican to offer that fact as a refutation of our doctrine that to reduce the tariff on shoes reduces their price?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly I misunderstood the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think possibly I misunderstood the Senator from Texas. I understood him to say that the result of taking the tariff off of hides was a fall in the price of hides.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not say that the price had fallen.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, if the price which he received was not reduced, how did the American farmer lose?

Mr. BAILEY. I said the price had been reduced; but there is a great difference between saying that a price had fallen and that a price had been reduced. To say that a price had fallen would mean that it was actually less than at the time selected for comparison; but to say that a price had been reduced by a given cause would mean that it was less than it would have been except for that cause. If the farmers and ranchmen receive less for their hides with the duty repealed than they would have received had the duty remained, then certainly the price of hides was reduced by a repeal of the duty and they suffered a loss.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But if the price of hides advanced after the tariff was taken off, how can the Senator from Texas claim that the taking off of the tariff resulted in a reduction or a loss to the farmer?

Mr. BAILEY. Because he would have received at least a dollar and a half more for each hide except for the repeal of the duty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How can the Senator demonstrate that?

Mr. BAILEY. By everything the Democratic Party has ever taught on the tariff question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish this answer. The Senator from Nebraska and I, as well as all other intelligent Democrats, maintain that tariff duties increase the price of every article on which they are levied. The only exceptions which any of us admit to that rule are in cases where we produce a large surplus and import but a small quantity of particular commodities. Now, if we are right in saying that to impose tariff duties will increase the price of the article on which they are imposed, then certainly we can not deny that we will reduce the price of an article by repealing the duty on it; and I must be right in saying that free hides have been worth less than taxed hides would have been.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator what other product of the farm has advanced since that time.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from Nebraska deny that a duty on an American-made article of which there are large imports enhances the price of the article?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not care to enter at this time into a discussion——

Mr. BAILEY. But that lies at the very base of the Senator's contention.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of a theoretical question with the Senator from Texas. I am challenging his statement of fact. He said that the result of the taking off of the tariff on hides was a loss to the American farmer——

Mr. BAILEY. And I repeat that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I claim that the figures prove that the price of hides has advanced since the tariff was taken off.

Mr. BAILEY. Even if that statement were correct, it would not disprove my statement. But the price of hides is less today than it was in 1910, which is only another way of saying that there has been a change in the price of hides since they have been free of duty, just as there were changes in the price of hides when they were subject to a duty. It is absurd for a man to undertake to establish or contradict a statement by taking into consideration a single circumstance and ignoring all other circumstances.

I will again ask the Senator from Nebraska whether or not he agrees with the Democratic Party in contending that by taking the duty off of an article we will reduce its price, and that by increasing the duty on an article we will increase its price?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disposed to enter into a theoretical discussion with the Senator from Texas. I arose to challenge his statement of fact.

Mr. BAILEY. And when I——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have challenged his statement of fact, and on that fact he based the declaration that the taking off of the tariff on hides had injured the American farmer. I stated that the evidence proved that no such result followed the taking off of the duty on hides and that the result of the taking off of the duty demonstrated the fact that the duty was for the benefit of the packing interests and not for the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator's information is not thorough enough. Does the Senator from Nebraska know that during the twelve months following the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich bill with its free hides we almost doubled our importation of hides?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, if that were a fact and if the price still remains higher than it was before the duty was removed, it would still controvert the statement of fact made by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The price does not remain higher. The price is not as high to-day as it was when that duty was repealed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me read from the Statistical Abstract, which brings the matter down to the year 1910.

Mr. SMOOT. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am reading from page 525. The average price of hides of cattle per pound in the year 1908 was 12.2 cents; in 1909, the year in which the tariff law was passed and hides were placed upon the free list, it was 12.4 cents; last year, the year after the tariff act had been passed, it was 14.8 cents, almost high-water mark for the price of hides in recent years.

Mr. BAILEY. That proves nothing in the world except that there were influences other than the tariff operating upon the price of hides.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the price he quotes—14.8 cents—as the average price for the year was for the calendar year, and that was for the year 1909—the year that the tariff bill passed. But he has not the figures here to show what was the price in 1910 or 1911. The price to-day on hides is lower than it was then.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to hear the Senator's explanation along this line. He seems disposed to meet the question of the Senator from Nebraska that, in spite of the fact that the duty was removed from hides, other circumstances than the mere fact of the removal of the duty caused an advance in the price of hides. If that be not true in reference to the advance in the price of shoes——

Mr. BAILEY. The price of shoes increased, due, as I think, to the circumstance that immediately after we repealed the duty on hides the Leather Trust, which they promised to break up by putting hides on the free list, enlarged its operations and marked up the price of leather.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator probably knows they established their agencies in every foreign country that exports hides to this country.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that is true.

Mr. WARREN. The net result is simply a loss to the United States of the customs which we formerly collected and greater profits to the trusts that have been organized anew and strengthened of old, because of our taking the tariff off of hides.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to get at the bottom of this that I may understand the argument clearly. Then the Senator from Texas would agree, I presume, with some of us on this side that the only hope for cheap shoes would be to put them in the same category with hides and put them on the free list.

Mr. BAILEY. That is exactly what I am trying to do.

Now, Mr. President, let us for a moment see how plain an illustration negatives the inference which the Senator from Nebraska seeks to draw.

You can take the price list and you will find that the price of hides varied from year to year under taxed hides, just as it has varied under free hides. We can not therefore conclude that the whole result, when there was a change in the law, must be due to the law and nothing else.

Mr. President, I want to admonish the Senator from Nebraska of the contradiction into which he falls. If taking the tax off of hides will increase the price of hides, then taking the tax off of shoes will increase the price of shoes. Does the Senator from Nebraska think that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It undoubtedly would have that effect unless a trust existed which destroyed competition.

Mr. BAILEY. You certainly do not mean that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. BAILEY. I said that if removing the tax on hides has increased the price of hides, then reducing the duty on shoes must increase the price of shoes, and I asked if the Senator from Nebraska believed that reducing the tariff on shoes would increase their price.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator misquoted me.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is misquoting me.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not pretended to quote the Senator. I have simply asked him a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Texas is implying that I claim that taking the tariff off of hides increased the price of hides. I made no such claim.

Mr. BAILEY. There could have been no point in interrupting me, then.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Texas declared that taking the tariff off of hides had injured the farmer, as prices were lower.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I did not say that the price was lower. I said that the repeal of that duty had decreased the price of hides, but that does not mean that the price had actually fallen below its former level. It only means that the price was thus made lower than it would otherwise have been.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He implied that, because the farmer could not have been injured unless there was a loss in the price.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not dissent from that statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rose to challenge the statement of fact and to demonstrate from the Statistical Abstract that the price of hides had risen instead of fallen after the tariff was taken off. I did not assert that it rose because the tariff was taken off.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator did not intend to combat my assertion that the price of hides had been reduced by repealing the duty on them, then his interruption was absolutely pointless.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like to know where the Senator from Nebraska gets his figures before I ask him a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I get them from the Statistical Abstract.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is undoubtedly true that immediately after we repealed the duty on hides the price of hides rose, just as immediately after we lowered the duty on shoes the price of shoes rose; but shoes, like hides, were subject to the operation of some cause that neutralized and overcame the fall in the price which a reduction of the duty in the one case and a repeal of the duty in the other case would have produced.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to make this statement: For the six months following the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill the price of green salted hides went up, but from that time on the price has declined.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. GRONNA. In June, 1910, the price of hides was from 10 to 13 cents, as the Senator from Nebraska will find if he will examine the price of hides in the Leather and Hide Journal.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not familiar with the price of hides within the last six months; but I know, if the official reports and the Statistical Abstract are reliable, that the average price of hides in 1909, the whole year and a half after the tariff act——

Mr. BAILEY. No; that is the calendar year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, I will state for that year, after the tariff act was passed.

Mr. BAILEY. For only about six months.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The price of hides was not only higher than it was at the time the tariff was taken off, but higher than it had been for a number of years previous to that time. I do not assert that that demonstrates that taking the tariff off of hides increased the price. I merely state that those statistics demonstrate that fact.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator must have intended to deny that free hides were cheaper than taxed hides would have been, or else he does disagree with what I was saying.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is mistaken when he says that the farmer was injured by taking the tariff off of hides.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield and to whom?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Nebraska can satisfy himself as to the loss sustained by the farmer if he will examine the testimony given by Mr. Tomlinson, secretary of the Cattle Growers' Association of the West. He will find that Mr. Tomlinson said the farmer sustained a loss of $3.50 per head on account of the duty being taken off of hides.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I presume there may have been some decline in the price of cattle.

Mr. GRONNA. There is no presumption about it. It is a matter of fact.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There has also been a decline in the price of cattle and there was no tariff on hides.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is arguing against his own point now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should be glad to have the Senator from Texas inform me in what way my argument is against the point I made.

Mr. BAILEY. I will do so as soon as I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Referring to the importation, the amount for the calendar year 1909 of importations of hides was $23,795,602, whereas in the calendar year 1908 it was only $12,044,435, or nearly double the amount after free hides became effective.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator from Texas that whenever the removal of a duty is followed by an increase in the price it must be owing to the operation of some factor working in spite of the removal of the duty and is not due to the removal of the duty. Perhaps the Senator may find that factor in the immense stimulation of the trade by the free entry of the goods, in this case hides, and in the immense increase in the demand while the supply remains stationary.

Mr. BAILEY. The supply was enormously increased by an almost double importation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean that our demand went up from about $12,000,000 to $23,000,000, while the supply of hides upon which we drew throughout the world remained stationary.

Mr. BAILEY. That will not explain it, because we did not increase our consumption of shoes, and the price of shoes advanced instead of falling. There was no increase in our consumption of shoes, nor can it be accounted for by an increase in our export of shoes. Although the export of shoes has been an annually growing one, it did not grow the next year by any larger per cent than it had grown in previous years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But we increased our manufacture of shoes very much.

Mr. BAILEY. No; we did not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, if I am not mistaken without referring to it, we increased our importations of shoes.

Mr. BAILEY. We import very few shoes. The revenue from imported shoes was less than $30,000 in 1908.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the export of American shoes for the two years?

Mr. BAILEY. Ten millions, in round numbers, for 1909 and about 12,000,000 for 1910.

Mr. SHIVELY. Last year we exported over $12,000,000 worth.

Mr. BAILEY. Over $12,000,000 and less than $13,000,000.

Mr. SHIVELY. There were over 7,000,000 pairs. Whether the price of hides rose or fell, there has been an increase in the exportation of shoes.

Mr. BAILEY. That was true even under the 15 per cent duty on hides.

Mr. SHIVELY. Going to show that the tariff is not always determining upon the question of exportation, in any event.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, undoubtedly.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but the export of shoes increased enormously while the tariff remained on hides. It has not increased since in the same proportion that it did under that tariff. Whether there is any relation or not the Senator can decide himself.

Mr. BAILEY. It has not increased in the same proportion, because if it increased from a million to two million, that would increase 100 per cent; but if to a two million export we add another million, the same as before, the per cent of increase would be only 50 per cent. There has been a constant increase in our export shoe trade, but the rate of increase was just as great when the manufacturers paid a 15 per cent duty on their hides as it has been since Congress repealed that duty.

Returning now to the question between me and the Senator from Nebraska. He does not doubt—for no Democrat doubts—that the tariff duty on imported wool enhances the price of domestic wool. How, then, can he deny that a tariff duty on imported hides enhances the price of domestic hides? And if to impose a tariff duty increases the price of hides, then certainly a repeal of that duty must reduce the price of hides. Now, if free hides sell for less than taxed hides, then our farmers and ranchmen received less for their hides than they would have received had the duty not been repealed, and therefore they must have suffered a loss.

That is the inexorable logic of the entire Democratic argument on the tariff question, and Democratic Senators must not abandon it when they find that the price of a particular article has moved in an opposite direction, because, upon a full examination of all the facts, it will be found that the tariff did produce its effect upon the price, but that other influences produced an even greater effect, sometimes in the same and sometimes in the opposite direction. The Senator from Nebraska can select any article he chooses, either on the free list or on the dutiable list, and he will find fluctuations in its price even when there has been no change whatever in the tariff law. Those fluctuations may, of course, occur coincident with tariff changes, and to the superficial student they may appear to negative what we agree to be the effect of every tariff duty on the price of every commodity; but a deeper study of the matter yields an explanation perfectly consistent with our arguments.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Taking the Senator's statement that there was a loss, we will say of $7,000,000 to the farmer and about $2,000,000, I understand, upon importations, making a total of loss in the price of the hides of $9,000,000, did it have no effect at all upon the price of the manufactured article? Did it, in fact, produce any reduction in the price of the finished article?

Mr. BAILEY. It did not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point I would like to hear the Senator bring out is the point that has been discussed here, that if we removed the duty on wheat it would not affect the price of flour. It has been stated that we removed the duty on hides and it did not affect the price of shoes. I should like to hear the Senator from Texas explain this matter. If he will bear with me a minute, every business man knows that every item of cost entering into the production of the finished article that goes upon the market has to be scrupulously taken into account, and there must be one of two things, either that same circumstance outside the mere fact of the remittal or change of duty has been effectual in maintaining the price or that there was such a monopoly of the business by virtue of these long years of their enjoyment of protection that they have intrenched themselves so that they are independent, whether they get their raw material free or whether they get it with the duty on it. I should like to hear the Senator just on that point with reference to shoes.

Mr. BAILEY. What I said was that the wearers of shoes had not realized any benefit from free hides. There has, perhaps, been a reduction in the wholesale price of the cheapest quality of shoes. It was the reduction of the duty on them, however, and not the repeal of the duty on hides which reduced the price of those shoes. You can give the manufacturer his hides free of tax—indeed, sir, you can give him his hides free of all cost—and still he will charge as much for the shoes made out of them as the competitive conditions of the market will permit. It was the reduction of the duty on shoes which forced a reduction in the price of certain shoes, but even that reduction has not manifested itself even in the wholesale price of the finer shoes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is not that on account of the fact, known among all business men, that the foreign shoes of the finer grade have no market in America on account of the style of the shoe, but that it is the commoner grades which are almost universally alike. Therefore, the repeal of the duty would affect the lower grades because we have competition by virtue of the lower grade, and until the foreigner makes our finer grades according to the style used in America we have the monopoly of that business and are mulcting the American people on account of that monopoly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from South Carolina has exactly explained the situation. No foreign shoe manufacturer can enter our markets with any hope of success, because it is true of everybody else as it is of Senators here, that when they go to buy a pair of shoes they prefer the same pattern every time. That habit is so strong with the American people that a foreign shoe manufacturer can not find any market here for his shoes. It may not always be this way, but it has been up to this time.

But, as the Senator well says, as to the coarser grades, such as the split brogan, which is the laborer's shoe, there has been a reduction in the wholesale price, though I doubt if even that reduction has found its way to the consumer.

But, Mr. President, I come back to the proposition that what has forced down the price of that split brogan is the reduction of the duty on it and not the repeal of the duty on the hides out of which it is made.

Mr. President, right in this confusion of thought rests this whole fallacy of free raw material. Senators and others say—the Senator from South Carolina has just said it—that the merchants and others are careful to compute every item of cost, and that is true. The merchants or manufacturers who do not do that finally settle their business in the bankrupt court or at an assignee's sale. But while it is true that they must receive when they sell their goods a price that returns to them every item of cost plus a profit, it does not follow that they sell their goods at a price which only does that. On the contrary, not only the manufacturer, but the merchant; not only the merchant, but the farmer; not only the farmer, but the butcher and the men engaged in every other occupation, charge just as much for what they sell as competition will allow them to charge; and, therefore, when the manufacturer obtains his raw material free he does not give his customer the benefit of it, but charges that customer whatever he can charge him under the tariff levied on the finished product, and the only tariff which enters into and determines his selling price is the tariff on the finished article. The tariff on the raw material enters into and helps to determine the manufacturing cost, but the manufacturing cost does not determine the selling price.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. In just a moment. If the Senator doubts that, let him take the case of a monopoly. Did any monopoly in the history of the world ever voluntarily reduce the price of its goods because it had reduced the cost of producing them? Monopolies sometimes do voluntarily reduce their prices, but they only do so when they find that by reducing the price they can so far extend their sales that the greater sales at the smaller price will net them a larger profit. Under those circumstances monopolies sometimes reduce their prices; but no monopoly in the history of the world—and I defy a contradiction—ever reduced its selling price because it had reduced its manufacturing cost.

Now I yield to the Senator from Utah and then to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senator to one item in the shoe trade, to show that the reduction of hides has not in any way influenced the price of shoes. There is the $3 shoe, the $4 shoe, the $4.50 shoe made by Douglas and Emerson, and many other manufacturing concerns in this country. When the tariff was taken off of hides the price of those $3, $4, and $4.50 shoes never changed and has not changed to-day. I would not care how cheap they bought their hides those shoes would be still $3, the Douglas shoes; $3.50, the Emerson shoes, and so along through the price of shoes. The testimony before the committee showed that that was the fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the retail price.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the retail price. It is what the consumer pays.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. I promised to yield to the Senator from South Carolina, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only point that I wanted to keep clearly before the mind of the Senate, and I think the Senator from Texas will agree with me, was that in spite of the fact that any manufacturing concern may have a monopoly of any trade and charge practically its own price, yet the Senator will not say that in proportion as you raise the price of his raw material you necessarily decrease the amount of his profits. The converse is true, and he will be compelled to raise the price even with a monopoly. I happen to know that in the cotton business you have—

Mr. BAILEY. Is there a monopoly in the cotton business?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, there is among the manufacturers.

Mr. BAILEY. I had not supposed that to be true.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If you raise the price of your hides and he has to pay for them you have reduced his profits that much.

Mr. BAILEY. We have been saying that the manufacturer's profits are exorbitant, and I would be glad to reduce those profits for the benefit of the consumers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator from Texas and the Senator from South Carolina are agreed on this, that the matter of greatest concern with us is not so much the exorbitant profits that the producer of raw material or the producer of the manufactured article may get, but the question of a fair and square deal to the consumer, manufacturer, and producer. I think that is the ground upon which we should argue this question.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the ground I have been arguing it on for ten years.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I maintain that in proportion as you cheapen the elements that enter into the manufactured articles you give the consumer the benefit of that, barring an absolute monopoly.

Just one point further and then I am through. As you cheapen the raw material and make it easy of access and you raise the profit, you necessarily invite capital to enter into it and necessarily invite competition.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the argument which the Republicans have been making for all these years in support of protection.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I just want to say to the Senator from Texas that I hope in my argument and in my politics I have learned one little rule in mathematics that is a pretty good one; it is that a straight line is the shortest possible distance between any two points, and I have tried to walk that straight line.

Mr. BAILEY. I have seen men try to walk the straight line and go farther around than anybody else.

The Senator and myself do not disagree about one point, and, if he would emphasize that point, we would not disagree at all. When he says that a tax on the manufacturer's raw material reduces the manufacturer's profit, he and I agree, and, by the same token, to exempt his raw material must increase his profits, must it not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but it does not reduce in either case the cost to the consumer.

Mr. BAILEY. No; the cost to the consumer depends upon the tariff duty on the finished product.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Providing he has a monopoly of the article.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no proviso about it. That is true without respect to monopoly. It is true that the manufacturer's selling price will depend upon the competition which he must meet. If that competition is sharp enough it will reduce his selling price to the lowest point consistent with American wages and American profits. If it falls below that he will close up his factory.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true, and that is just exactly along the lines that I claim that he would be compelled to have a monopoly of a business before he could exact an extortionate price for the things that he sells.

Mr. BAILEY. That is probably true if extortionate is used in its extreme and offensive sense.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I did not mean that.

Mr. BAILEY. I mean as a commercial practice. But while no man can practice an extortion on his customers unless he is sheltered from competition by a monopoly, it is still true that, under the restricted competition which exists in our market places in consequence of the tariff, unfair prices are charged. We have said that a thousand times before we ever heard of these great combinations. For a century, and without any qualification about monopolies and trusts, our party has been charging that under these high tariff duties American manufacturers have extorted from American consumers conscienceless profits. The Senator must agree to that, every Democrat must agree to that, or else what we have been saying against our Republican opponents and their policies was not sincere.

Mr. President, if it is true that under this high protective tariff American manufacturers have extorted conscienceless profits, shall we swell their profits by giving them raw material free, which the Senator himself says will increase their profits?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to explain this matter here, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to explain it, because it is an injustice to me.

Mr. BAILEY. I am answering the Senator according to his own statements, for I understood the Senator to agree with me as to the effect of free raw material on the manufacturers' profits.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not agree, for this reason——

Mr. BAILEY. Then, more is the pity.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not believe that I, the producer of raw material, because the manufacturers are exacting that to which they are not entitled and because it works a hardship on me in a sense, shall become a party with the manufacturer to work that hardship for my benefit on the consumers of this country. In proof of my faith, I am willing, wherever possible, for the benefit of the American people, to give them my material free, if necessary, and then to stand and fight to see that the manufactured article shall be reduced to where in justice it is proper, and to put it on the free list if necessary.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I thought the Senator said a moment ago that he believed in a square deal for the producer, the manufacturer, and the consumer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I now regret to find that he has modified his position to the extent that he is not willing for the producer of raw material to share in the square deal, but desires to leave all advantage in the way of a tariff to the manufacturer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Not that, Mr. President. I want to just change the phraseology a bit. I believe in the square deal, but I am not going to be a party to the square steal. That is the difference.

Mr. BAILEY. Anybody who steals, even from South Carolina, ought to be put in the penitentiary; but does the Senator say that a revenue tariff is a steal?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not.

Mr. BAILEY. We were discussing the tariff on hides, which was only 15 per cent, and raised a net revenue of more than $2,000,000 annually. Does the Senator from South Carolina think that was a steal or a Democratic revenue tariff?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, as this question is asked, I want to state that I have sat here day after day, and I have really deplored the fact that this question was not argued upon the basis of a revenue of what the Government required; but, on the other side—and I am sorry to say that in some instances on this side—the argument seemed to be turning upon whom it would benefit as a citizen of this country, and not as to the benefit of the Treasury, in meeting the requirements of our Government economically administered.

I take it that there is not a Senator here who will not agree that we can not arbitrarily fix a blanket rate on all articles for our revenue. There are some articles that Democrats and Republicans would agree ought to bear a higher rate than other articles; but the aim and object of the Democratic Party has been to collect revenue to the least injury and to the best benefit of all, according to the article and according to its necessity to the people; to provide protection for none under the law, but simply to collect revenue. I do not know, I am not competent to say, what that would be on a specific article without going to our customhouses and studying all the imports and studying the relative necessity of that article to the people of the country. All that I am concerned about and all that I am contending for is that upon all these articles, if the people of this country can be benefited by having them free, in the name of Heaven and of our free institutions, let them have them free. If I were to grow wheat, I would infinitely rather prove my faith in seeing the bread eaters of this country get cheaper bread than to demand protection because the man who manufactures the flour is charging more under protection than he is entitled to, and by saying I am willing, so far as raw material is concerned, to throw wide open the door and give the people a chance to get bread as cheap as they may. That is my whole contention.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am ready to answer the cry for cheap bread whenever they will likewise answer my cry for cheap clothes; but no party can ever compel me to take the duty off of what comes from the farm so long as a duty is left on what the factory makes out of it. That is my creed and that was the creed of the Democratic Party in its best days; that was the creed of the Democratic Party when John C. Calhoun represented the State of South Carolina on this floor. In one of the memorable contests revolving around this very question of free raw materials, forced upon the Democratic majority here by a Whig minority, John C. Calhoun voted that the manufacturers should pay a duty on their raw material so long as they collected a duty on their finished product. That, sir, was the creed of the Democratic Party in all the years of its glory and of its success, and it only abandoned it under the blandishments of New England. In the late eighties and early nineties the Democratic Party resolved to unite the South with New York and New England upon a free raw material and gold-standard platform, and then Grover Cleveland persuaded us from our allegiance to the elder faith and committed us to the doctrine of free raw material. If any Democrat can read the history of that time with pride or satisfaction, his mind is constructed differently from mine.

I mean no reflection on Mr. Cleveland's integrity; I intend no criticism upon his patriotism; but, sir, his mistakes all but cost the Democratic Party its organization. He tried to make Republicans out of us, and thus prepared the way for Bryan who all but succeeded in making Populists out of us. I am a Democrat. I am neither Populist nor mugwump; neither Socialist nor Progressive nor reactionary; I am a plain, old-fashioned Democrat, simple-minded enough to believe, sir, that from the teachings of Democrats like Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson and John C. Calhoun I can still derive profitable instruction and that in following them I shall keep the faith of the Democratic Party.

In the law which was called the Walker tariff there was a duty on hides, there was a duty on wool, there was a duty on wheat, and there was a duty on flour. It may be that was wrong, but shall I be accused of lacking in party fealty because I would write a tariff bill in this day that is almost a literal transcript of the one they wrote in that day? I think not.

Mr. President, when I come to ask where the burden of taxation shall be laid I look about me. I see these farm homes; I see the men who have cultivated them for years stooping beneath the weight of a mighty burden, and I refuse to still further aggravate that burden. On the other side, I look at these rich manufacturers, and I find them crowning the mountain tops with palaces which rival in their magnificence the dreams of oriental splendor; I find them rolling in wealth; I find them practicing excesses which would have put to shame the lords of feudal ages. It is, sir, upon them, God giving me the power, with the people's aid, that I would lay the burdens of this Government.

Do you believe the farmers are so prosperous that their homes should be stripped of their ornaments so that the Federal taxgatherer may be paid? Who dares to say so, if he lives among them or if he even visits among them at election time? I have seen their children playing in innocent amusement with bare feet, while the manufacturer's children are drawn in gold carriages; and am I a demagogue because I demand that we shall lift the burdens from that humble farm home before we do from that manufacturer's mansion? Oh, sir, if this be demagogy, I am proud to proclaim myself the chief of demagogues; but I want to warn you that many of you will wish that you had joined me before this contest is over.

You may think the American farmer has his mind steeped in ignorance because he has not the leisure from his daily toil to learn as well as others may how this Government can oppress and despoil him. You may think he will not understand this new policy, which has been deliberately entered upon and which proposes to take the tariff off of everything which the farmer produces and leave the tariff on everything which he must buy.

If you tell me that the people want cheap living in the cities, I answer that the people who live in the country want cheap living there. Why give cheap living to one and refuse it to the other by law? The people of our cities now live better than those in the country. The laborer in the city can buy a barrel of flour, ground from the farmer's wheat, with less labor than the farmer can produce the wheat which makes that barrel of flour; and so it is from luxury to necessity; the city man can command them with less hours of his toil than the farmer can.

Whoever heard, Mr. President, about the high cost of living until the prices of agricultural products advanced to a remunerative basis? Have we not for years been paying extortionate prices for all the products of the factory? For 50 years, under this high tariff, everything purchased from the factory has been purchased at an enormous price. Do you doubt it? Call the roll of the manufacturers and find those who are impoverished and those whose wealth staggers the imagination. They are all rich. Can you call to mind a farmer who has grown rich upon the farm? How did the manufacturer grow rich except by the exorbitant prices which he exacted from farmers and laborers alike. Yet just as soon as the value of agricultural products rose to a point that enabled the farmer to pay the mortgage off his home; to paint his house, to send his children to the free school, comes this cry from the cities against the high cost of living. Nothing was said when the farmer was being plucked by the manufacturer, but every fiber of congressional nature responds when the farmer begins to assess the manufacturer a fair price for the product of his land and his labor.

Mr. President, they told me in 1894, when they put wool and hides and lumber and attempted to put many other raw materials on the free list, that we were going to divorce the farmers and producers from the protective-tariff system. I was a Member of the House of Representatives when they passed the Wilson bill. I did not believe in it, and for that reason I did not speak upon it. I sat there through the whole debate and said never a word, because I did not believe in this free raw-material doctrine. They passed that bill. Did it divorce the farmers from the Republican Party? It divorced us from the Government just as speedily as the people could get to the polls, and a similar bill will bring us a similar disaster.

Now, let me record this—I will not call it a prophecy, I will call it a prediction—let me record this: Mr. President, if the Republican Party attempts to apply its doctrine of protection to some industries and free trade to others, the people will crush it; if the Democratic Party attempts to apply its doctrine of a revenue tariff to some industries and free trade to others, the people of the United States will crush it. No party, no matter what its tariff doctrine may be, dare to apply that doctrine unequally and unfairly to the industries of this land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether or not I correctly understood the Senator from Texas a moment ago. Did I correctly understand him to attribute the Democratic defeat in the Cleveland régime to the tariff legislation which was passed?

Mr. BAILEY. I do attribute the defeat of 1894 largely to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator said that the result of that legislation was to divorce us from the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. I also said that they told me that with free raw material we would divorce the farmers and producers of raw materials from the protected industries of the country, and thus insure our triumph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question in the interest of historical accuracy or to ascertain his opinion of what the historical result meant. Does not the Senator from Texas believe with me that in that time of panic and of raids upon the Treasury for gold, the Democratic Party, happening to be in power, would have been put out of power, no matter what it had done concerning the tariff and no matter what it could have done? Does he know of any instance of any political administration weathering the storm of a great panic?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, they beat us in the congressional elections of 1894 worse than they did in the presidential election of 1896.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but was not that because the depressed conditions continued to exist, and, while the acute stage of the panic had passed, the hard times for the actual producer were increasing for quite awhile after the financial panic had had its break?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi needs to be a little careful there, because he and I have charged repeatedly that the hard times existed in 1892, and that it was due to the stringency originating under a Republican administration that Mr. Cleveland was called back into the Presidency a second time, after having been defeated once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas, I think, need not warn the Senator from Mississippi upon that point. The Senator from Mississippi has made that contention, made it no longer than three or four days ago, and he makes it yet. He says that the beginning of that period of decreasing prices, discouraging enterprise and production and encouraging hoarding, began as far back as 1889 and 1890 and gradually increased until the boil burst in the shape of a financial panic. It reached its acute stage then, though it began before; but it undoubtedly did reach its most acute and depressing condition and stage while we were in power and continued throughout Mr. Cleveland's administration. Times did not begin to grow better until about the last year of his administration, and while the acute stage, the financial, bank form of the trouble passed away, the producer's trouble did not pass away immediately, but became somewhat worse for a while after, and then gradually the trouble was cured, as all troubles of that sort are cured, by the panic leading to a rock-bottom cash industry after liquidation and increased labor and production.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I want to finish with this matter first and then I yield to the Senator from Utah. I will not say that our disaster of 1894 was due entirely to the tariff bill, because I think there were several causes—I had almost said a multitude of causes contributing to it, but since the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator, then, would we not have had the same trouble if we had never passed the tariff bill at all?

Mr. BAILEY. We would have had trouble, but not the same trouble.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would we not have had that panic whether or not we passed the tariff bill at all?

Mr. BAILEY. I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did we not have it before we passed the tariff bill?

Mr. BAILEY. We did.

As illustrating that the tariff act of 1894 contributed to our defeat, I will describe the political conditions as they existed in Texas at that time, though I know that the conditions existing in our State may not typify the condition existing in all States. About the time we passed that tariff bill we were afflicted with the Populists. If any Senators were never troubled with them, they do not know what is ahead of them if the Populists should ever come their way. They were active, and many of them were very eloquent; I think most of them were sincere and patriotic, and all of them extremely vociferous and disputatious. We used to have joint discussions with them, and they had one story which I have heard them tell 50 times. They did not argue against us on the money question; they argued against us almost entirely on the tariff question and on the free raw-material phase of the tariff question. I see a friend of mine who has the honor to represent a Texas district in the other House, who has had some experience with these same gentlemen. One of their stock stories was this: They would tell how they rode up to a farmer's house—they would pretend that it was a personal experience, and that Populist audience would shake the courthouse from turret to foundation stone every time the story was told—and found a farmer shearing sheep. He was shearing the sheep toward his head, and the Populist orator would declare that he told the farmer that was not the way to shear a sheep, and the farmer would answer, "I know that just as well as you do; I know that the way to shear a sheep is from his head back, but I am a Democrat, and I am ashamed to look these sheep in the face since the Democratic Party took the duty off of wool and left it on woolen clothes."

That same Populist Party elected 15 or 20 Members to the House of Representatives at that election. In the great Democratic State of Texas we saved four districts by less than 1,500 majority.

I never attempted to controvert the Populist position on the tariff question at that time, but I frankly admitted that the Democratic Party had made the mistake of assuming the old Whig Party's position and had allowed the Populist Party to take the true Democratic position. I am not certain, but I am under the impression, that there were some Populists in the State of Mississippi at that time. I know there were some afterwards, but I do not know it as well as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I do not know that they made the tariff attack upon us there, but I do know they made it upon us in Texas, and they made it with tremendous effect.

Mr. President, it may be that some Senators are so highly educated and some constituencies may be so highly educated that it will be easy to convince them that it is right to take the tax off of the wheat as it comes from the farmer's granary and to leave a tax on the flour as it comes from the corporation's mill, but I do not believe it. I say, sir, if you are going to take the duty off of the steer as it leaves the farm there ought to be no duty on it as it goes to the laborer's table. I say if there is no duty on wool out of which the manufacturer weaves his cloth, there ought to be no duty on it when the poor man buys it and hands it over to his thrifty wife to make it into a genteel suit of clothes. That is my philosophy; this is my creed—equal justice to all men, to all industries, to all sections, to all classes, and special privileges to none. Under that sign, sir, the Democratic Party will conquer, and under no other sign can it ever hope to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest, as I always do, to the remarks of the Senator from Texas. No man admires his great ability more than I do. No man wonders more at his great intellectual acuteness, and I can only regret to see that ability and that acuteness not being used at this moment, in my opinion, either for the benefit of the party of which he is a member or the country of which he is a citizen.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I have just been expending my strength and time speaking for a bill passed by the Democrats in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is not so simple to imagine that I am so simple as not to know that he knows that if he can put that bill upon this bill he kills that bill and this bill both.

Now, Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Texas will not imagine that he is the only Democrat in this great body or the only Democrat at the other end of this Capitol. That he has right to claim to be par excellence a Democrat is of course undisputed. But he is not the Democratic Party—not one of us here is—and what I meant just a moment ago was that at present his great ability is being chiefly used, practically, as far as this particular matter is concerned, in giving aid and comfort to the enemy. I do not intend to make a long speech, and I would have made none but for the ex-cathedra air, the schoolmaster way, in which the Senator from Texas has undertaken to teach us Democracy, referring to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I think, as one "who is sitting around with books in his hand trying to catch his fellow Democrat in some error." The Senator from Texas must remember that he can not freely attack the position of his Democratic colleagues, as in the speech he has just made and in a former speech he has done, without expecting them, in their ineffective and frequently helpless way, as compared with his great ability, to attack the attacker.

The Senator from Texas must remember the old story about the man who took the leadened end of his buggy whip to the dog's head and smashed it, and when the owner of the dog came out after awhile and said, "Why didn't you hit him with the other end of your buggy whip?" replied, "Why didn't your dog come at me with his other end?"

The Senator from Texas can not attack the party and the party's policy as announced by a Democratic House of Representatives—and a majority in this body of not two-thirds only, the number necessary to bind the Democrats here, but a majority of more than nine-tenths of the Democratic membership here—and not expect a Democratic Senator from another State, perhaps helplessly, perhaps hopelessly, perhaps ineffectively, to hunt up such statistics as he can to reply to him to the best of his ability and opportunity. This only was the sin—if sin there was—of the Senator from Nebraska.

Having said that much, Mr. President, I want to talk a little about some of the positions taken by the Senator from Texas to-day. The Senator from Texas has the antifree-raw-material microbe. Some other Democrats elsewhere have the free-raw-material microbe. I am trying to the best of my ability to catch neither disease—to harbor neither germ.

I think when you are fighting a great system which is oppressing the people—the system of protectionism, whether it be protectionism in one item to an agricultural producer, protectionism in another item to a miner, protectionism in another item to a manufacturer—and when the enemy are intrenched in power and fortified in their rifle pits—and I can not choose the particular position which I regard as strongest and best fortified and least accessible to take first—then very frequently I am compelled to take the lowest position in the ramparts, because it is the line of least resistance—I am compelled, if I would deal successfully with an enemy like that, to undermine, to sap the line wherever I can and override it wherever I can. To leave the metaphor off, in attacking protectionism my idea is that when I am furnished with the opportunity to reduce a protectionist duty anywhere, it is my time to act, even though I can not right now act in reducing another and a more oppressive protectionist duty elsewhere in the line of combined special interests.

I am very much like the Irishman who came out on the occasion of an Orange parade at Tipperary with a shillalah, and when some one said, "Whom are you going to fight?" replied, "God only knows, I do not; but I am going to hit the first Orange head I see." I am going to destroy the first protectionist abuse that I can discover and get at. If a Republican President is kind enough to give me an opportunity to deal practically with a few of them—I started to say I am going to thank him. I reckon that is useless gratitude—I will rather thank God for the lucid interval which he has had and proceed to take advantage of it in the interest of an overtaxed people.

The Senator from Texas took a position a minute ago, if I understood him, and if I did not, at any rate what I have to say about it will, I hope, be accepted as a just and accurate economical thought concerning the effect of the free entry of raw materials, which I do not consider correct. From my own standpoint, the result of the free entry of raw materials is just this: The first effect of it is to cheapen the process of production to the manufacturer, because the raw material is a part of the cost of the finished product after it has gone through the process of manufacture. The first effect of cheapening the cost of the raw material to the manufacturer is to increase the profit of the manufacturer. The effect of increasing the profit of the manufacturer is to stimulate that particular manufacturing business and to invite more people to participate in it because of its high profit. The second effect upon the raw material itself is to increase the demand for it in order to supply the needs of a stimulated business, and increasing the demand for the raw material necessarily increases the price of the raw material to the extent of the increased demand, whatever that may be. So that frequently it happens that while the natural effect of taking the duty off the raw material is to decrease the price of the raw material, that effect is partially counterbalanced and sometimes for a time wholly counterbalanced by the much-increased demand. Whether that has happened in this case of hides, to which he has referred, I do not know.

Now, Mr. President, what happens to the manufacturer after that? Increased competition, which is invited by increased profits, leads to a decreased price. It is very seldom, indeed, that a decrease of the duty on a raw material used by a manufacturer leads immediately to a decrease of the price of the finished product. But after the process has been in operation long enough for the invited competition to come into play, the increased competition competing for business in the manufactured product decreases the price of the finished product.

And that happens in every case except these two: Wherever there is a monopoly of the business, of course, real competition can not be increased and the effect of decreased price will not be felt, and wherever there is a tariff duty upon the finished product so high as to be prohibitive, or practically prohibitive, there, also, the natural effect which I have described is counteracted and nullified. So thus far the Senator from Texas is right; where there is a tariff duty upon a manufactured product high enough to enable the American manufacturers to sell at an exorbitant price anyhow, despite the cheapened cost of production brought about by the free entry of the raw material, they will try to sell as close up to the line of the level given by the tariff shelter as they can, and if there are few enough of them and they are able to do it they will form a so-called "trust," or, in plain English, a combination, for the purpose of making that competitive effort ineffective and fruitless.

Mr. President, so much for that. There are three sorts of a tariff, Mr. President, and I am going to turn schoolmaster for a few minutes myself, not for the Senate, of course, but because it seems that this particular question has never been sufficiently clarified in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There is, first, a tariff for protection. The rates under that tariff, if those who are advocating it and drawing a tariff bill are logical, will go to the point of prohibition of importations from foreign countries into the domestic markets. But as Tom Carlyle said, "Thank God mankind are not logical," and no protectionist ever yet existed who dared draw a tariff bill which was logically protective all through its items, all along the line. No tariff bill has ever been drawn by a protectionist every duty of which was prohibitive. But as the object of it is to give the home market to the home producer, it could not be completely successful unless the duties were high enough to exclude all foreign competition.

Ideally that is the protective tariff. Now, what is ideally the free-trade tariff—for that is the next tariff? It is a tariff levied entirely upon noncompeting articles. A free-trade country, like Great Britain, may collect almost as much money in tariff duties per annum as we ourselves do. But the duties are levied upon noncompeting articles, with the declared purpose that the import duties shall not in any way disturb the home producer, and so that every dollar of cost added and collected in price from the consumer shall go into the Government treasury, so that there is not even an incidental protection to disturb the home producer, to discriminate against the consumer in favor of the home producer, or to give advantage to one home producer over another.

Then there is the old historic Democratic tariff which, so far as I know, is peculiar to America alone of all countries. It has never existed as a fact upon any statute book, but it has been the goal toward which Democrats have tried to travel. The Walker tariff of 1846 came near it and the tariff of 1857 still nearer. The theory underlying that sort of tariff is this: First, that a tariff is a tax; secondly, that it is a tax upon the consumer; third, that all taxes ought to be as nearly as possible equal, and that, therefore, tariff taxes upon the consumer ought to tax all consumers, and that the various importations ought to be divided into about three classes, roughly outlined in this way: Necessities of life and necessities of manufacturers in one class, meaning by "necessities of manufacturers" what are ordinarily called natural products or raw material; and that upon that class, being necessities, there ought to be levied the very smallest possible duty consistent with the effective administration of government.

Then there ought to be a class of so-called luxuries—and I think I am striking the Walker tariff idea—and the duties levied there ought to be as high as possible without encouraging smuggling. Then there is an intermediate class between the two, which we may call the class of comforts, or whatever we choose to term them, and upon that class of articles there ought to be levied a duty at what is called the maximum revenue point, meaning by that the maximum revenue point in so far as the Government requires a revenue. The ideal maximum revenue point is the point at which the Government can get the highest point of revenue multiplying the rate by the volume of importation. But if the Government does not need that much, then, of course, it will levy a less tax, and that is the tariff which was professed by Mr. Cleveland and by most of the other men who have led the Democratic Party in the past.

Mr. President, if there were a clean slate the Senator from Texas and I, I take it, would stand pretty nearly together upon what I have just explained to be a tariff for revenue only. But there is not a clean slate. There is not a clean slate nationally, and there is not a clean slate internationally, and the difference between a theorist and a statesman is that one drives blindly at the ideal desired and the other drives at the highest good attainable practically under existing conditions here and elsewhere to be met. There is not a clean slate nationally. No tabula rasa there, because we have in existence a protectionism which is in the very bone and blood of the commercial and industrial body of the United States, and nobody but a madman would undertake to tear it all down at once or to run through it the delicate rapier of a delicate theory.

You may want to remove a house to build another one; but, if there are other houses in that neighborhood or people close around, you do not blow it up with dynamite. You take time about it.

When Sir Robert Peel changed the opinion or policy of a lifetime and undertook to introduce free trade in Great Britain he took 10 years to complete his work—to reach the goal. Little by little his work was done and in such a manner as to leave in the wake of each tariff reduction or removal, not a soup house or empty factories and unemployed labor, but plain and obvious and palpable amelioration in the general condition of the people.

Have you a clean slate internationally? Not a bit of it. The trouble with the antifree-raw-material theory is just that. I should say unhesitatingly that I would infinitely rather have a small revenue duty upon raw materials than to have them free but for the circumstance which I am going to mention now, which is the difficulty in the way of this theory, and that is an international industrial slate written all over, not a tabula rasa. There is not an enlightened country on the face of the globe at this time which has not, wisely or unwisely—it makes no difference which—in violation of or in obedience to sound economical law, whichever it may be, admitted to its manufacturers free raw material.

What is the result, as far as we are concerned, whether we like it or not, whether it accords with an ideal tariff system or not? What is the result? Are Senators going to take the position that they neither expect nor desire the increase of American manufacturing productions beyond the point where they fill the home market? No. Democrats, of all men, least can take that position. We have always contended that with small tariff taxes on the finished product and on material and machinery used in manufacturing them our manufacturing business must grow; that other people would buy from us because we would buy more from them; and that after awhile the world's market for our manufactures would come into existence, as well as a home market.

But whatever theory there may be about it on one side or the other of the political line, this is the fact of American development and American growth: With our magnificent resources, our magnificent area of domestic free trade, which has had more to do with our prosperity than any other one factor, except the intelligence and freedom of our people, our manufacturing business has grown in the past, and will grow until it has overleaped the national boundaries and has leapt into foreign territory. It is doing it now where not overtaxed at home nor forbidden foreign entry by foreign protective tariffs.

It is wrong to hothouse manufacturers by legislation. From my standpoint it is immoral, unethical, and dishonest to levy a tribute upon one man in order to make another prosperous. I join in every word of the eloquent diatribe that the eloquent Senator from Texas has just pronounced in his eloquent manner against the oppressive profits and the excessive wealth that have come to the manufacturers of this country as a favored class in contrast with the laborers and the farmers. But there is just one thing, Mr. President, which is worse than hothousing the manufacturer by taxation at the expense of others into prosperity, and that is handicapping him by taxation into a condition where competition with foreign manufacturers is hopeless.

If English and German and French manufacturers can bring in their raw materials free, and if the American manufacturer can not bring his in free, then you have, by fixing a tax upon the raw materials, handicapped by legislation your own manufacturer until he is hopeless, outside of your own boundaries, to do business except in those few cases where the superiority of his genius, the superiority of his organization, the freedom from excessive military taxation and burdens, the freedom from various other oppressive regulations, will enable him, notwithstanding the handicap, to compete and excel.

Now, I take it that what I am about to say is the right Democratic position from the moral standpoint—and this tariff question is a moral question. I join with a great Democrat in saying that it is no more righteous to commit larceny by operation of law than it is to commit it in violation of law. Government has a right to tax me 5 per cent, 10 per cent, 50 per cent, 100 per cent, to take all I have if it be necessary for governmental and public purposes, to maintain the Government, to assert the independence of the country, to preserve the liberties of the people, to educate the children of the people. More than that, it has the right not only to take all I have, but to take all I am, take me myself, and put me on the firing line as food for gunpowder, but it has not a right to take one nickel out of my pocket or out of the pocket of the humblest negro who is laboring on my cotton plantation or the preacher on his circuit or the clerk at his counter to give it to any man. If the Government does not need it, then the Government has no right to deflect it to aid the business of another man, whether that man be a farmer or whether he be a miner or whether he be a manufacturer, I do not care.

And when the Senator from Texas tells me that he can not attack and can not join in an onslaught and a charge upon the bold, fortified lines of the enemy, where the rifle pits of the protectionists who are receiving agricultural protection duties are stationed, and now and here accessible to attack, simply because he can not at the same time take the still higher point where the rifle pits are filled by people who are receiving benefits through protectionist duties on manufactured articles, there is where he and I differ.

Protectionism is my enemy, the enemy of my people, the enemy of my labor, and, in my opinion, the enemy of right, morality, and economic ethics. Wherever I see a protectionist duty I shall, if I can, abolish it, and sometimes when things are bundled up together so that I can not get them apart I will abolish even a revenue duty if by doing it I can reduce in whole or in part of other duties which are protectionist duties.

Now, what is all this talk about the great distinction between putting a small duty on a thing and putting it on the free list? What does it amount to after all? The first and the second are questions of reducing taxes paid by the consumer. Suppose on a thing there is a tax of 10 per cent and you reduce it to 5 per cent, you have reduced duties, that is all. Suppose it bears a duty of 10 per cent and you reduce it to nothing, you have reduced duties, that is all. You have untaxed the people to that extent. Even if it were true that untaxing the consumer as far as the raw material is concerned would not go to the ultimate consumer immediately, I would still do it, hoping that I would get a chance at the other fellow at the finished product end of the line of legislative larceny later on, and when I got it I would take advantage of it.

But there is nothing more childlike and bland than telling me that when you put raw material upon the free list you are doing it for the benefit of the manufacturer, unless in the cases where the manufacturer is in a position where by virtue of monopoly or something else he can absolutely or substantially control and fix prices. The stimulation of business by cheapening the cost of production and the increase in the volume of business and the higher temptation held out by higher profits in business will bring about the competition which will bring about the price reduction. It is true that removing a duty upon raw materials merely enables the manufacturer to reduce his prices, while reducing the duty upon the finished product forces him to do it.

But I do emphasize this, that when you come to fix the point of price reduction toward which you shall force him it is very largely fixed by the factor of the rate of duty upon the raw material. If you will take a raw material and tax it 20 or 25 per cent, then you can not in common fairness and common justice and common sense reduce the duty on the finished product as much as you otherwise could by fully that 20 or 25 per cent. If you do it anyhow, you are committing a worse wrong than hothousing by taxing an industry into prosperity. You are committing the crime of handicapping by taxation a production which would without your handicap have a fair chance and an equal opportunity with the foreigner.

If I understand the Democratic doctrine, it is this: The goal is to divorce just as far as we can government from big business and big business from government, and to take the Government out of the business of being a silent partner in private enterprise. Under our system, where no direct taxes can be levied except when they are apportioned between the States, we could not, if we wanted to, resort to a free-trade tariff; but we can levy just as few taxes as possible; and unless we want to handicap our manufacturers in the foreign market we have got to give them the same opportunity to buy their raw material here as the foreigner has there. Unless we want to handicap them even in the home market, when we come to fixing tariff rates we have got to put as much more tax on the finished product as amounts to the tax on the raw material. So you have absolutely handicapped them not only in foreign markets, but in the home market, by making them charge a higher price in order to obtain the same profit, thus decreasing the volume of their business in your home market.

Therefore, while I would theoretically, and if I had a clean slate, operate with the Senator from Texas in having taxes on all imports, so that all consumers might be made to contribute to the Federal Treasury, and he and I would not then differ very far, yet confronting actual conditions, as they are to-day here and abroad, he and I differ about to the extent that I have indicated. I am glad to see that the Democratic Party as a whole in this House and in the other is taking the position which it seems to me is right.

I am so constituted that I do not like ever to sit down without taking notice of a misapplied anecdote, if there is any. I have heard many, many times that old story about the sheep being sheared backward and the man who said, "He had never been able to look a sheep in the face after the Democrats took the duty off of wool." I think, like most of you, my fellow Democrats, I have heard it from Republican lips told upon the Democratic Party. They told it all over the country. I reckon they told it out in Idaho, out in Wyoming, out in Colorado, and everywhere in the country. I see the smile upon the face of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and I expect he told it himself. So it just happened accidentally, of course, that even the anecdote of my friend the Senator from Texas was to-day Republican. But he has amended it to make it a tariff-for-revenue anecdote; that is to say, he amended it from the way I heard it. I always heard that the man merely said, "Oh, yes; that is all right; but I have never been able to look a sheep in the face since they put wool on the free list." My friend adds, "and kept the high duty on the finished woolen products."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to the smiling gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will not be interrupted, I think the reason why they were not able to look a sheep in the face after they had taken the duty off of wool was because the sheep had disappeared.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not the way the story goes; but there is nobody in this Chamber who can better explain, elongate, or diversify any statement, even an anecdote, than the Senator who has just taken his seat. I would be willing to accept the anecdote with the amendment but for the fact that I do not find the sheep are increasing in the United States very rapidly even now after a long time of high duties upon wool, and I do find that sheep raising thus far at any rate, as shown in the tables, is capable of supplying the increased and increasing American demand for wool. That leads me to another thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator if it would disturb the line of his argument, but I wanted to make the suggestion, based upon the facts, that it took about one year for the sheep to disappear, and it takes about seven years to reinstate the sheep business after the duty has been restored.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I do not believe I care to go into that except to say this——

Mr. HEYBURN. We will go into it later.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, anything in the world can disappear quicker than it can reappear—a sheep or an oak tree. It is a truism in itself. I am not going to undertake to deny it. Even the Senator from Idaho or I could disappear quicker than another man could reappear.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, I will respect the Senator's wish not to pursue the subject, but if it would not be an intrusion upon him, I would suggest that as soon as sheep were no longer profitable but were rather an encumbrance because of their lack of value they disappear just as soon as they could be driven or shipped from the ranches. But sheep flocks are not produced in one year. It takes several years to reinstate the sheep industry after it has been driven out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, it has been 14 years since this "great tragedy" concerning sheep occurred.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have the sheep now and we want to keep them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the sheep are not increasing in proportion either to population or other agricultural production, or in proportion to manufacturing production, or in proportion to national wealth or national demand for wool and woolens.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are the third largest wool-producing State in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I am not talking about a particular State.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have the sheep and we want to keep them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am talking about wool in the United States. My heavens, what in the world has the percentage of wool grown in Idaho as compared with other States got to do with the question of a tariff and our being able to produce a sufficiency of wool for American domestic consumption?

Mr. HEYBURN. It has something to do with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield in a minute, but I want to answer you. Of course, it is the truth that every frontier State passes through its pastoral stage. They begin by raising cattle and sheep and things of that sort. Then later on they begin to substitute the production of cereals and cotton and so forth for it. Still later, diversifying their industries as well as their agriculture, they have manufactures, and all that. There always has been a period in the United States when there were States out in the West that were increasing their number of head of sheep and when there were States in the East that were decreasing theirs. That will go on just as long as the evolution of the human race pursues its usual course, and pastoral conditions give way before increased density of population and diversification of industry and higher priced lands, and so forth.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would call the Senator's attention to the official figures. The value of sheep in the United States in 1896 was $65,000,000, and to-day it is $233,000,000. So they do not seem to have disappeared under the existing tariff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The selling price! Yes! Now, will the gentleman read the figures for the last 10 years, or hand it to me and I will read them for the last two years; i. e., the number of sheep. The gentleman has, I fear, resorted to the old trick of argumentation, which is to go back to an initial year about as bad as could be found. Eighteen hundred and ninety, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, down to 1896, were years of great hardship, when all sorts of values were going down and all sorts of production was discouraged here and elsewhere. The gentleman has taken one of those years and then taken a very highly prosperous year 14 years later and compared the two. But the point I am making is this, and I am making it to the Republican intellect: The whole theory of protectionism rests, if it rests rightly on anything at all, upon the principle that by encouraging home production you finally bring about a volume of production which is sufficient for home consumption, and that by thus bringing the field of competition into the encouraged business you reduce prices. The whole theory of protection rests upon this basis, that you want to produce the encouraged or protected thing in quantities sufficient for home consumption.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if you find anything concerning which that is hopeless, and you are compelled to admit from past history that you have not done it with regard to wool, and that you can not do it, then the theory of protection quoad that particular thing—wool—has failed.

Now, as to wool, you have never succeeded in protecting it, hothousing it into a production of a volume sufficient for the American market.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one minute. There was a time at which the American people produced wool to export, and under various tariff systems later—several of them protective; indeed, for the most part protective—the difference between the amount of wool needed for American consumption and the amount of wool grown in America has increased rather than decreased.

Now I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator has announced a new doctrine, which is that we protect an article for the purpose of enabling our own country to produce it to the extent of fully supplying the wants of our people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I announce that that is what I regard as a Republican doctrine; it is not mine.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; that is the Senator's declaration, to produce a sufficient quantity for home consumption. Would the Senator apply that to sugar and rice? Would he take the tariff off of sugar and rice because we do not produce enough to supply our own people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has no special favoritism in the way of production.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator remove those duties because our——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi is not now advocating free wool for that matter; and here upon the floor of the Senate the other day he said he would much prefer a duty of 20 per cent on wool to no duty at all, because the Senator from Mississippi realizes that the Government must have revenue, and he would not give away all that revenue for nothing; and because, in the second place, the Senator from Mississippi believes that 20 per cent duty on wool after a few years will bring more money into the Treasury than 44 per cent duty upon wool now does.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator manifestly has been advocating free raw material. I do not think wool is a raw material.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator from Mississippi has simply awkwardly expressed himself. The Senator from Mississippi has been trying to the very best of his ability to deplore and regret that the Democratic Party should be divided into two classes, one of which is making a fetish of free raw material and the other is making a fetish of antifree raw material, and to express his own determination to tear down protectionism by the easiest possible methods that he can find, regardless of either theory. That is the question. The Senator from Mississippi went on to say that in the long run, if we were going to carry our manufactures into other countries, we would have to have free raw material, or else the other enlightened nations of the earth would have to tax their raw material.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no disposition to disturb the harmony that prevails to-day on the Democratic side of the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The harmony is complete, I think, except as to three or four.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the contrary, I feel very much as Sir Lucius O'Trigger expressed himself in The Rivals, when he said:

> The quarrel is a very pretty quarrel as it stands; we should only spoil it by trying to explain it.

The Senator from Mississippi has not answered my question. When the Senator says sheep have not increased under the protective policy he ought to go to the record, because the record is that in 1896——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard that.

Mr. GALLINGER. In 1896, under a Democratic tariff, sheep in this country were valued at $65,000,000, and to-day they are worth $233,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard that. That is absolutely true.

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been a progressive increase year by year since the enactment of the McKinley tariff law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that trick of argumentation, taking a very low initial year.

Mr. GALLINGER. But there has been a progressive increase.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, I should like to call his attention to the number of sheep.

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been a very large increase of the number.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have the figures here. There has been practically no increase for the last 20 or 30 years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order to get this right, I will read it. The number of sheep in 1896 was 32,000,000. I am reading round numbers, not all the figures. In 1898 they had decreased to 29,000,000, a decrease of only——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is reading the wrong column.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is reading the wrong column entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see; I am reading about oxen.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is reading the oxen column in place of the sheep column.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is right; they are side by side. I will read it. I am reading it merely to get it in the RECORD, so as to show I am not trying to avoid any figures of any sort. The same result follows as to sheep, except, of course, there are different numbers.

In 1896 the number of sheep was thirty-eight and a quarter millions, in round numbers. In 1897 it was thirty-six and three-quarter millions, in round numbers. Perhaps I had better read the exact figures, so that they may go into the RECORD.

In 1896, 38,298,783. In 1897, 36,818,643. In 1898 they increased in number to 37,656,960. In 1899 they increased to 39,114,453.

Mr. GALLINGER. Protection was getting in its work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, it was setting in awfully slowly, if it is taken in comparison with the increase in population and——

Mr. GALLINGER. A couple of millions a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the increase in practical enterprises of every description. If the Senator will let me read the figures first, then he can argue later.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In 1900, 41,883,065; and then the next year there was a jump, and there were, in 1901, 59,756,718; then, in 1902, 62,039,091; then, in 1903, 63,964,876, in round numbers 64,000,000; and then, in 1904, it dropped to 51,630,144, a drop of 6,000,000 in one year; then, in 1906, it went up to 50,631,619; in 1907, 53,240,282; in 1908, 54,631,000; in 1909, 56,084,000; and in 1910, 57,216,000. From 1896 to 1910, in 14 years, an increase in round numbers of 19,000,000 in the number of sheep, out of a present total of 57,000,000 in round numbers. Nineteen is 33⅓ per cent of 57. Divide that percentage by 14 to get the average annual increase in the number of sheep. The result is not astounding, to say the least. In 1901 sheep for the first time got back to what they had been in 1886, and passed it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me one word, I will be through and I shall not interrupt him further——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not mind interruptions.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber are making pleas in behalf of the farmers of the country, and they have even got a so-called farmers' free list. In 1896 the value of the sheep on the farms was $65,000,000 and in 1910 it was $233,000,000. It seems to me that under the protective policy of the Republican Party we are doing pretty well by the farmer, so far, at least, as the sheep producer is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes. I could increase the value of bananas—or rather the price; they would have no higher value—in the United States, too, very largely by simply putting a very large duty on them and robbing the consumer out of just that much in the shape of tax-made price. There is not any great secret about that. That is the reason I read the numbers instead of the prices.

Now, the question remains upon this bill. I am willing to vote for the reductions on all of the duties on manufactured products which are made in this bill; I am willing to face a print-paper trust with free paper, which is a finished product, and with free wood pulp, as well as free pulp wood. I am willing to reduce the duty on dressed meat to the extent to which it is reduced here, and I would be willing to reduce it more. I am willing to put the articles which are placed on the free list here on the free list as regards Canada. I would not put all of them on the free list as regards the whole world, because I think it would needlessly violate the symmetry of the tariff and would needlessly sacrifice revenue that is needed. I am willing to vote for this bill because it is a reduction of taxes pro tanto upon the American people, and if Senators could convince me that it did not reduce taxes over $500 I would still vote for the bill.

The Senator from Texas and I are the best of friends personally and politically, and are going to remain so. I sat at the feet of Gamaliel in the other House when he was the minority leader of that body, and I am not ashamed to say that I learned, although older in years though younger in service than he, many a lesson of Democracy; but I do not believe he is teaching me practical Democracy to-day, and I believe that he will come to a time when he will see it. I regret that even for the moment he should be out of touch with the new Democratic House and with the Democratic part of the Senate. I expect to see him in the future right nine times where he is wrong once on tariff questions, but I think he is wrong now, and I could not keep my seat after this lecture to the Democracy of the country, but rose to express my conviction, at any rate, that I am a Democrat in spite of the position taken by the Senator from Texas, that the Democratic House is Democratic, and that these Democratic Senators are Democratic, and that in voting for this reciprocity bill we are casting a vote at least not undemocratic. That, Mr. President, is my apology for the few unnecessary remarks that I have made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when the Senator from Mississippi declared that I am giving aid and comfort to the enemy, he forgot that when interrupted I was denouncing a tariff bill enacted by a Republican Congress and approved by a Republican President. He forgot also that when denouncing the law which placed hides on the free list without placing boots, shoes, and leather there with them, I was repeating what all of my Democratic associates in the last Congress said more than once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just want to say that you and I are both in favor of the Democratic free-list bill, of course. The only difference is that I do not want it as an amendment here.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator had no right, and no other Democratic Senator had any right, to project himself into my criticism of the action of a Republican Congress with the suggestion that I am giving aid and comfort to the enemy. Who, sir, are his allies? The Republican chairman of the Finance Committee; he marches side by side with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and almost every stalwart protectionist on that side. One of the first, and one of the most cordial, letters which came to the President indorsing this reciprocity agreement with Canada was from Nelson W. Aldrich, the high priest of protection. Was he apt to volunteer his approval of a Democratic measure. No more than President Taft was to originate one. Giving aid and comfort to the enemy! Is not Aldrich with you and against me? Is not PENROSE with you and against me? Is LODGE not with you and against me? Is ROOT not with you and against me?

An overwhelming majority of the Republicans in the Senate will vote with the Senator from Mississippi and against me on this motion; and I could, therefore, with better reason, say that he is acting with the enemy. The Senator from Mississippi forgets when he taunts me with being in a minority among Democrats that he is with the majority among Republicans on this motion. Such an expression was neither just nor generous. Probably I will not be able hereafter to return that taunt; for if he thinks I ought to surrender my opinion to the majority on this question he will think it right for him to do so on all other questions, and he may never be in a minority of our party.

I am as good a party man as any good citizen ought to be; but when I must prove my democracy by supporting the policy of a Republican President, I will revise my rules for determining my party affiliation. When I must establish my fealty to the Democratic Party by following the flag so gallantly borne by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] I will take a new inventory of my opinions. He is a Republican of the stalwart kind and he never voted a Democratic ticket, or scratched a Republican ticket, in his life. I can understand how he would feel bound by a sense of party loyalty to support this administration measure; but we have indeed fallen upon strange times when a Democratic Senator upbraids a fellow Democrat for refusing to sustain a Republican President. I have been here for more than 20 years and the Senator from Mississippi can not find a single instance where any Republican President has ever relied on me to help pass one of his administration measures.

Under that Democratic administration from 1893 to 1897 I helped to do some things which I did not think it wise to do. I helped pass the Wilson Bill when I knew it was not constructed in accordance with the principles of the Democratic Party; and if, sir, my party shall be called back to power I have no doubt that I will find it necessary to yield, on rare occasions only, let us hope, but at least on some occasions, my individual opinion for the sake of party unity; and I will cheerfully do so when the good to be accomplished is, upon the whole, greater than the evil.

The Senator from Mississippi says that he and I both favor the free-list bill; but that he does not want it as an amendment to this bill. I will take it in any fair way that I can get it, and I believe that the surest way to get it is to engraft it on the reciprocity bill which the President so much desires, and thus compel him to give the country what we say it ought to have, or make him deny his administration the achievement which he has publicly and repeatedly proclaimed a signal triumph of statesmanship.

The President might veto this free-list bill if it were sent to him as a separate matter, but he would be a madman to veto the reciprocity bill in order to prevent the free-list bill becoming a law if he thinks the reciprocity bill worth half the effort he has made to pass it, for the free list does not signify much one way or the other. It is of so little real consequence that I would never say to the farmers of this country that it will compenate them for a fraction of the injury which the Canadian treaty inflicts upon them. It gives them free implements; but implements can now be imported free from all countries except from those which levy a duty on similar articles from our country. Farm implements from our greatest commercial rival are now free, and this will subtract but little from their price. It puts cotton bagging and cotton ties on the free list, but that will be worth to the cotton planters of the South only about 10 cents a bale on their cotton. It puts salt on the free list; but the salt bill of an average family for a whole year would not be equal to the protection on a single wool hat at 42 per cent. The whole saving to the agricultural people of the United States will not be 10 per cent of what they lose on the wheat crop if the Canadian treaty shall reduce the price of wheat 10 cents a bushel. But it will be worth something to our farmers, and all Democrats should zealously support it.

Mr. President, when this farmers' free list is voted down, as it will be, I shall offer the woolen schedule as it passed the House, with some important amendments. I do not believe that the duty on cheap clothes and cheap blankets ought to be higher than the duty on Brussels carpets, and so I have transposed those duties. I have reduced the duty on all woolen goods except the finer grades of carpets to 30 per cent, and I have raised the duty on wool to 30 per cent.

What will those gentlemen who from time to time have insinuated that I am a protectionist say to that change? The people buy woolen goods, and I am trying to reduce the duty on them from 42 to 30 per cent; the manufacturers buy wool, and I am trying to increase the duty on it from 20 per cent to 30 per cent. Who will call that protection? Is it protection. sir, to demand that when the manufacturer imports his wool he shall contribute to the support of the Government the same as the farmer does when he imports his woolen goods? Is not the manufacturer better able to pay a tax on wool than the farmer is to pay a tax on woolen goods? During the debate on the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill Democratic Senators declaimed with great vehemence about the enormous profits of the woolen manufacturers, and will they tell me now that the woolen manufacturer is not able to pay as high a duty on his wool as the man of toil and poverty must pay upon his woolen clothes? To say that, sir, is to deride the history and the traditions of our party.

We have never made an argument on the tariff question which did not appraise a revision of the woolen schedule as much more important than any other tariff reform it is possible to propose; and yet I am told that my amendment reducing every duty in the woolen schedule must be rejected because its adoption will jeopardize this treaty, and some who do not really favor the treaty say that it must pass without amendment because they believe it will tend to still further divide the Republican Party. I do not believe that. If the Canadian treaty is wrong, and the Republican Party passed it, we might profit by its mistake; but if it is so bad as to disrupt the Republican Party, what must happen to us if we help to pass it? We will simply neutralize the effect of the President's blunder.

The refusal to put the free list and the woolen schedule on this bill is predicatd upon the idea that if we do so the President will veto all of them. That argument when analyzed simply means that if we pass the reciprocity bill, which the President so much desires, and let him sign that and lay it away in the archives of the State Department, we will then leave him free to veto the other bills. If the President will veto Canadian reciprocity because the free list and the woolen schedule are attached to it, will he not veto the free list and the woolen schedule if presented to him separately? Certainly he will. If he would veto all of them together he will certainly veto the two which he does not want after we have given him the one which he does want; and by this mistaken course the Democrats of the Senate put themselves in the attitude of saying to the world that they set a higher value on the President's reciprocity agreement than we do on our woolen schedule.

If you desire to destroy the protective system, let us revise the woolen schedule. That is the keystone of the protection arch; and if we nullify that agreement between the shepherds and the weavers, made more than 40 years ago and religiously observed until now, that arch will crumble Take the protection from the woolen manufacturer and leave him a revenue duty only; take the protection from the wool grower and leave him a revenue only, and you will make an irreparable breach in this tariff wall.

I am ready to join you in that. Are you, my fellow Democrats, willing to join me in doing it? I have no pride of authorship about the wool and woolens amendment. The least of you can draw one and offer it, and I will withdraw mine and vote for yours. If one of you shall make it 40, and another shall make it 30, and still a third shall make it 20 on wool and woolen goods alike, I will vote for the lowest duty proposed.

You can not cut the rate too deep for me. All I ask you to do is to cut it share and share alike. I will vote for as low a duty on wool as you will vote for on woolen goods.

The Senator from Mississippi complains that I have essayed the rôle of a schoolmaster, and then proceeds to do the same himself. I may have been too dogmatic in manner, but I was accurate in my matter while he was not, and I will show him from the Democratic scriptures that he was not. He declares that in framing a Democratic tariff bill we must put the necessaries of life and the manufacturers' raw materials on the same basis. He can find no warrant for that opinion in the platforms or in the legislation of the Democratic Party until the Cleveland era. I have here our doctrine as laid down by Robert J. Walker in his celebrated report, which was approved by a Democratic Congress, and was universally accepted as a correct statement of our position for 40 years. Now let us examine this report and see if it instructs us to treat the manufacturers' raw material as we do the necessaries of life. Walker specifies six rules according to which all tariff bills should be constructed, and, as they are brief, I will read them to the Senate. They are as follows:

First. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth. That all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

Sixth. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

Mr. President, there is no word in what I have just read to warrant the Senator from Mississippi in saying that a Democratic tariff bill should treat the manufacturer's raw material the same as the poor man's necessaries of life. Some Senators may think that such a warrant can be implied from the third rule, which declares that below the lowest rate which will yield sufficient revenue an article may be, for imperative reasons, placed on the free list. But, sir, that the profit or the prosperity of the manufacturer is not an imperative reason within the meaning of that rule for placing his raw material on the free list is made perfectly manifest further on in this report. After indicating the principles which should govern the Democratic Party in framing a tariff bill, Mr. Walker proceeded to assail the Whig tariff act of 1842, which he strongly urged Congress to repeal, and the very first criticism he made against that law involved an explicit condemnation of the doctrine of free raw materials. I understand, of course, that all Senators have read this passage, but it is so pertinent to the issue between the Senator from Mississippi and myself that I am sure I will be pardoned for reading it to the Senate now. It runs as follows:

The present tariff is unjust and unequal, as well in its details as in the principles upon which it is founded. On some articles the duties are entirely prohibitory and on others there is a partial prohibition. It discriminates in favor of manufactures and against agriculture by imposing many higher duties upon the manufactured fabric than upon the agricultural product out of which it is made.

Could anything be plainer than that? Not only, sir, is it impossible to fairly imply any sanction for the doctrine of free raw materials from the third rule laid down by Walker when read in the light of this declaration, but every fair-minded man must admit that what I have just read goes further and unequivocally repudiates even the proposition to lay a higher rate of duty on the manufacturer's finished product than on the farmer's raw material out of which it is made. Not only does Walker's report expressly condemn the doctrine of free raw materials, but the act of 1846, passed by a Democratic Congress and approved by a Democratic President, followed the report in that respect. Nor can we infer that in levying fair duties on raw materials the Democratic Party acted without any fixed purpose, for that very question was presented to the Senate while the act of 1846 was under consideration here. One of the Whig objections to the act of 1846 was that it reversed the policy of the then existing law with respect to raw materials and the Hon. John M. Clayton, a Whig Senator from the State of Delaware, offered this resolution:

That the bill be committed to the Committee on Finance with instructions to remove the new duties imposed by said bill in all cases where any foreign raw material is taxed to the prejudice of any mechanic or manufacturer, so that no other or higher duty shall be collected on any such raw material than is provided by the act of 30th of August, 1842; and, further, so to regulate all the duties imposed by this bill as to raise a revenue sufficient for the exigencies of the country.

On that resolution, which commanded the Democratic Finance Committee of the Senate to do what the Senator from Mississippi says it is our Democratic duty to do, they called the roll, and on that roll call every Democrat in the Senate, save and except three, voted against it. The three Democrats who voted for that resolution were the two Democratic Senators from Pennsylvania and a Democratic Senator from Connecticut, and when they called the roll on the final passage of the bill itself those same three Democratic Senators who had voted for that resolution voted against the act of 1846.

That resolution was adopted with the aid of these three Democratic Senators by a majority of one vote. It went to the Finance Committee of the Senate one afternoon, and that committee reported it back the next morning without altering a line or a letter of it. Thus a Democratic Finance Committee openly defied the order of the Senate and refused to do exactly what the Senator from Mississippi says it is our Democratic duty to do, and when the Democratic tariff act of 1846 became the law of the land there was no trace of the free raw material doctrine in it.

That act levied a duty on wool; that act levied a duty on lumber; that act levied a duty on wheat and hides, and on all other products of the farm or ranch with a single exception. The only agricultural product on which it did not levy a duty was cotton, and at that time no revenue could have been collected on cotton, for none was imported. That is not true now. A duty of 20 per cent on cotton would to-day raise more than two and a half millions of revenue, and I would cheerfully vote to levy that duty. The cotton imported comes from Egypt, and goes into Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It is spun into the finest threads and fabrics, which are subject to a high duty and sell at a high price, but the manufacturers pay nothing on the raw material.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me I will say that if I ever have an opportunity to join with the Senator from Texas in voting for a duty on that cotton, I will be glad to do it.

Mr. BAILEY. It is due to the Senator from New Hampshire to say that no man in this Senate is more consistent in adhering to his doctrine than he is. He is a high protectionist, and if there is anything higher than a high protectionist, he is that; but he is consistently so, and therefore I believe, indeed I know, he is honestly so. I have great respect for a man who believes so thoroughly in his doctrine that he is always ready to apply it; but I have little patience with any man who has so little confidence in his doctrine that he is always making exceptions to it. A man who believes in the soundness of his doctrine is always ready to apply it, and every time he admits the necessity of making an exception to it he acknowledges its unsoundness to that extent at least, or else he acknowledges his own insincerity.

The Senator from Mississippi makes a defense of the doctrine of free raw material which is certainly a curious one to come from a Democrat. He says that the philosophy of free raw materials is that if we give the manufacturer his raw material free we will increase his profits, and as we increase his profits we will attract new capital and new men into the business, which in turn will reduce his profits. That is precisely the argument which the Republicans have long made in favor of protection. I ask the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] if it is not. He is reluctant to agree with me, but he has the candor to do so and he nods his assent.

The Republican Party has told us that if we would lay high duties on manufactures and keep the foreigner out of our markets, we would stimulate the establishment of factories, and they would multiply until their competition would reduce the price of all American-made articles to the lowest price consistent with American wages and American profits; and now comes the Senator from Mississippi and attributes the same effect to free raw materials, thus furnishing an additional proof that free raw material is a device for the encouragement of manufactures, which is only another name for protection.

The Senator does, it is true, qualify his statement as to the effect of free raw material by saying that it will not work out where the market is controlled by a monopoly or a combination. Mr. President, the Democrats of 1846 opposed the doctrine of free raw materials long before a combination or a trust was ever organized. They denounced it then as a species of protection to the manufacturer, and there was no suggestion that a combination or a trust would interrupt the operation of a commercial law. The Senator from Mississippi says that he does not favor free raw materials, but he also says that a duty on their raw material will handicap our manufacturers. Are we not handicapping our farmers by compelling them to pay a duty on the manufactures which they must buy? And why handicap the farmer any more than the manufacturer?

Let me show the Senator from Mississippi how unequal and how unjust his scheme would be. Let us take wool. If we levy no duty on wool and a duty of 40 per cent on woolen goods we not only impose a burden on the people who buy woolen goods, but we confer a special favor on the manufacturer. The duty on foreign goods is fixed according to their price in the foreign market, and that price is, of course, made up of the cost of the raw material, the labor cost, and the capital cost of manufacturing them. Those three elements constitute the cost of all production. There are what are sometimes called miscellaneous costs like deterioration, repairs, etc., but they are properly chargeable against capital cost in my general division. Therefore, a duty of 40 per cent on woolen goods means not only 40 per cent on the labor cost and the capital cost, but 40 per cent on the cost of the raw material as well; and free wool with a 40 per cent duty on woolen goods simply gives the manufacturer a bounty at least to the extent of 40 per cent of the cost of his raw material. Is that right? Is it just and honest to encourage manufactures in that way? Certainly, sir, it does not lie in the mouth of any man who advocates a special privilege like that to complain at me because I demand an equal treatment of the farmer with the manufacturer. If we must encourage manufacture by repealing the duty on what the manufacturers buy from the farmers, then, sir, let us encourage agriculture by repealing the duty on what the farmers must buy from the manufacturers.

Suppose we reduce all duties an average of 35 per cent and reduce them on everything alike. Suppose we reduce them so that we can go into the urban and rural precincts and say to all classes "we have reduced the duty on what you sell, but in equal ratio we have reduced the duty on what you buy." What fair-minded voter in the city or in the country can be dissatisfied with us then? But, if we commit the folly of discriminating between classes we will forfeit our claim upon the confidence of justice-loving men, and they will withdraw their support from our party.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am much interested in the Senator's discussion. I want to suggest one question to him. He says that if we go into the manufacturing districts and say to the operatives "we have reduced the duty on the goods that you manufacture and we have likewise reduced the duty on the articles that you buy"—and the Senator suggests about 35 per cent as the average duty that he would think wise to impose—the operatives would be very well satisfied. Now, Mr. President, the Senator possibly has not thought out this particular point, that if 45 per cent or 40 per cent is a protective duty, 35 per cent may be below the protective point, and we might just as well have absolute free trade.

Mr. BAILEY. We would not have sufficient revenue to support the Government if we collected no custom duties.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly so.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the only purpose for which I would impose any tax.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I wanted to call attention to was that if we put the duty below the protective point the operatives with whom he is going to talk are going possibly to lose their employment and they will have nothing whatever with which to buy these cheap goods. If the Senator or his party is going to put the duty below the point that will enable us to compete successfully with foreign countries, the manufacturers will, of course, go out of business and the operatives will go out of business with the manufacturers. We had a little experience of that kind not many years ago.

Mr BAILEY. We also had an experience under our system, and a most prosperous experience it was.

Mr. President, it is now too late to go into a discussion of tariff details this afternoon. The truth is I have been holding the floor because I promised the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. LA FOLLETTE) that I would prevent a vote to-day. He was not ready to speak, and I told him that he could remain at home and work and that I would see that no vote was taken. As I have now accomplished that I am ready to yield the floor, but before I do so I will cheerfully answer the question propounded by the Senator from New Hampshire. Let us take what all consider the most important schedule of the whole tariff law—the woolen schedule. The entire wages paid by the woolen manufacturers of this country constitute less than 25 per cent of the value of their product.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true in any country.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah knows more about the woolen goods industry than any other man in this Chamber, because he has a practical knowledge of the wool trade; he knows it from the wool on the sheep until the cloth goes into the tailor's shop, and he agrees with my statement, that the entire wages of our woolen mills constitute less than 25 per cent of the value of their product. Then, how, sir, if we leave a 35 per cent duty, are we going to close them up?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. So that there may be no misunderstanding about the amount of wage that goes into woolen manufactures, I wish to say that in yarns, in blankets, and in cheap woolen products of any kind the labor does not amount to more than from 22½ to 25 per cent, but in this country when we manufacture a piece of cloth, the finer the cloth the greater percentage of labor in it. So I can not agree with the Senator if he is going to say that 25 per cent labor is all that is required in manufacturing a piece of cloth.

Mr. BAILEY. That includes fine cloth.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, in any cloth that the American people wear, perhaps with the single solitary exception of the very coarsest kind of tweed. Outside of that there is in the wage a great deal more than 25 per cent of the cost of manufacturing.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, let me show the Senator how he has unconsciously fallen into a most obvious mistake. He assented to my statement that the total wages paid constitute less than 25 per cent of the total value of the woolen-mills' product, and he has also said that the wages paid in the manufacture of the cheaper goods average only about 22 per cent of their value. Now, taking both statements together, it is apparent on their face that 35 per cent will more than cover the wages paid to the operatives of the highest skill.

Mr. President, I might repeat here what I said in another connection to the Senator from Mississippi—and the argument is just as good against Republicans as it is against Democrats—that the duty on an imported article includes a duty on the labor cost as well as on the raw material and the capital cost. Now, if you levy a duty——

Mr. GALLINGER. And depreciation.

Mr. BAILEY. That is capital. That ought to be charged against the plant. I think the economists agree that every item of the cost of production can be included in the three elements I have named.

Now, a duty of 35 per cent is 35 per cent on the raw material, 35 per cent on the capital, and 35 per cent on the labor. That is the protection which a 35 per cent duty affords, and as the labor constitutes less than 25 per cent, how can the laborer be deprived of employment because a duty of 35 per cent is left on a 25 per cent labor cost? Oh, no, I am not afraid of closing up our woolen mills.

Mr. President, in the present state of the public mind a substantial reduction of the tariff is inevitable, and if the Senator from New Hampshire and the stalwart faction of the Republican Party really believe that such action will culminate in an industrial disaster they ought to stand out of our way and let us do that work. They have no earthly chance to prevent the doing of it sooner or later, and if it will bring the misfortunes which they predict, then the sooner they come the better it will be for the country, because the sooner they will pass. Not only will it be better for the country, Mr. President, to do this work without delay since it is certain to be done, but it will be better for the Republican Party, because if our revision of the tariff does bring the evil times which the Senator predicts, then he may reasonably hope to see his party restored to public favor.

Mr. President, before I resume my seat, I desire to reciprocate the sentiments of cordial friendship which the Senator from Mississippi has expressed toward me. It is true, as he says, that we served long together in the other House where we were friends, and I am sure that no difference of opinion can establish a different relation between us here. I have endeavored to cultivate a tolerence for differences of opinion, and I hope that I have not failed in my attempt to do so. But, sir, while I can tolerate differences, I do not fear them, and if the three or four Democrats who are still voting with me on this question should yield, as others have done to the pressure of a majority, I would stand all the more firmly in my place and declare my convictions. There are worse things than being in a minority, and the gravest offense that any representative of the people can commit is to do what he believes is wrong in order to join the majority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not know that the Senator from Texas had taken his seat.

Mr. President, some of the history of my friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is almost as erroneous as his opinion that a Democrat could hardly vote for Canadian reciprocity and remain a Democrat upon the tariff question is unsound.

Mr. BAILEY. I never said that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Albert Gallatin, a great Democrat and a father in the faith, sent as his Treasurer's report or as a part of his report the so-called Free-Trade Memorial, in which he advocated free raw material.

Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury under Franklin Pierce, I believe it was, sent his Treasurer's report upon the tariff question in which he advocated free raw material. The historical observation made by the Senator from Texas to the effect that he would defy anybody to find any Democratic sentiment or any Democratic doctrine in favor of free raw material prior to the Cleveland régime I might leave right there with those two instances. But I prefer, I believe, to go further while I am about it.

Albert Gallatin and Guthrie both were Secretaries of the Treasury of course prior to the Civil War. After the Civil War—or the War between the States, as I prefer to call it, because it was not a Civil War anywhere except in a part of Missouri and Kentucky and east Tennessee and north Alabama—the Democratic Party began to deal with the tariff again, and I will go on with that part of the history in a moment. But before I go to that I want to follow up the Robert Walker views upon the tariff. The Senator from Texas undertook to reply to what I had said about the classification of the necessities of life and of industry as possibly being the classification which ought to be put upon the free list by reading from Robert J. Walker's report what he said answered my statement. It happens to be that a part of what he read is what I think justifies it. It is the third reason given "that below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, and for imperative reasons the article may be placed in the list of those free of duty." [Italics mine.]

Now, I take it that among "imperative reasons" no stronger can exist than that a thing is a necessity of life or a necessity of industry.

In 1867, November 30, R. J. Walker used this language in a public letter upon the tariff question:

> But the tariff of 1846, although it remained much longer in operation than any other tariff, and produced much more beneficial results, was susceptible of great improvements, especially in its application to the present condition of our country.

Conditions had changed somewhat between 1846 and 1867. They have changed still more from 1867 on till now and in the same direction.

First—

He continues—

> the raw material of manufacturers, as recommended in my first annual report, should be duty free, as is the practice of all enlightened nations. This proposition then made by me was to some extent defeated at that time by Mr. Calhoun.
> His argument was this: That, so far as no revenue was collected on the raw material of manufactures imported here, we must make good the loss from other articles, and that this was an unjust and unconstitutional discrimination in favor of American manufacturers. My answer was, first, that it would never be unconstitutional to permit any one or more articles to come in duty free.

And as great an admirer as I am of Mr. Calhoun, I admit that I can not see any more than Robert J. Walker could, that it "could be unconstitutional to admit any article to come in free."

He goes on with his answer:

> That Mr. Calhoun had agreed to a large free list in the compromise tariff of 1832; third, that in point of fact there was no real loss of revenue, but an actual gain, resulting in this way: That, as our imports were measured by our exports, specie only liquidating occasional balances, and that, as we reduced our exports, we were necessarily diminishing our imports and decreasing our revenue.

To illustrate this, he went on to give an illustration about dyestuffs and some others. Now, he goes on:

> This proved to be the case, as shown by the tables of our exports of dyed goods under the tariff of 1846 as compared with those of 1842. After a close investigation of this subject and after examining the tariffs and manufacturing establishments of foreign countries in 1851–2 and 1863–4, I am convinced that to admit the raw material of manufacturers in all cases duty free would greatly increase our wealth, augment our exports, imports, and revenue, and diminish the burdens of taxation.

Now, I do not agree with that last sentence of Robert J. Walker, about all raw material being admitted free, but I have read it just as I have referred to the utterances of Albert Gallatin, Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Guthrie, when Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, to show the historical incorrectness of the idea as to the fact that is in the mind of the Senator from Texas, and with the permission of the Senate, not having the utterances of Mr. Guthrie or of Albert Gallatin upon my desk now, I will obtain them later and put them in my remarks. They again and again advocate exempting raw material from taxation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PARTS OF MEMORIAL OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE FREE-TRADE CONVENTIONS SENT BY ALBERT GALLATIN TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED AS A REPORT.

[From p. 118.]

Raw materials are admitted free of duty because they are not, in that state, immediate objects of consumption, but necessary for the production of commodities to which the national industry may be advantageously applied.

[From pp. 128–129.]

If, however, the profits of the manufacturers are, by reason of the high duties laid in their favor, greater than the average profits in other pursuits, it is a simple transfer to them of the consumer's property, a flagrant injustice, which should, independent of any consideration of a general nature, be immediately corrected by a sufficient reduction of the duty. But although there are exceptions, perhaps more in the case of raw materials than in that of manufactures, it believed that where there is no monopoly against domestic competition this will be sufficient, ultimately, to reduce the profits of any particular pursuit to its proportionate rate as compared, according to its nature, with the profits of other branches of domestic industry. [Italics my own.]

[From pp. 130–131.]

If the protecting system has had a beneficial effect on agriculture or commerce it must be in reference either to the raw materials of domestic growth employed in the manufactures or to the supplies for which they give a market or to the transportation of both, as well as of the manufactured products.

It is obvious that no allowance be made, in this view of the subject, for the impulse given to the growing of wool, hemp, flax, or any other raw material which is itself sustained by a high protecting duty. The same reasoning applies to those as to any other protected article, whether of the growth or manufacture of the country, which, since it requires such protection, must be a losing concern if left to itself. If otherwise, the protection is useless, and the additional price arising from the bounty an unjust transfer of the property of one to another class of citizens. But it must, on the other hand, be recollected that the difference of price between the domestic cloth, for instance, and the similar foreign article free of duty, or, what is tantamount, the national loss incurred in the domestic manufacture, embraces both that on the wool or raw material and that on the manufacturing process.

It is otherwise with respect to cotton. The duty on that of foreign origin, which is about 33⅓ per cent on the value, is purely nominal. This is always true in regard to any article of domestic growth or manufacture which is usually and extensively exported. Any commodity which can in foreign markets where it has no protection sustain the competition of every similar foreign article will sustain it on still better terms in the home market, and is not protected by the duty, but by its intrinsic superior cheapness or quality.

[From pp. 132–133.]

Manufactures give also a value to certain raw materials which had little or none before—iron works to the ore, paper mills to rags, glass works to ashes—but the cost of extracting or producing most of those constitutes the greater part of the price; and the aggregate surplus value of all is so small, as compared with that of the manufactured article, that it is hardly worth consideration.

But it is principally respecting the increased consumption by the protected manufactures of supplies of domestic origin other than the raw materials, and, above all, of breadstuffs and other provisions, that the most exaggerated accounts have been industriously circulated. It might be supposed from the language held on that subject that the agricultural interest was exclusively indebted for its prosperity to the restrictive system. We are told of the "invigorated condition of our agriculture in the last three or four years, during which period the value of the labor of the farmer, and with it the value of his land, it is well known, has risen some 20 per cent or 30 per cent," and that "this augmentation in the value of agricultural labor and capital can be ascribed to no other cause than to the increase of the manufacturing classes and to the rapid growth of our home market under the protecting system."

[From p. 134.]

The enlightened advocates of the protecting system need not be informed that all those fluctuations are exclusively due to the foreign demand; that in a country which always raises what is equivalent of 1,500,000 barrels of breadstuffs beyond its own consumption, the price depends on the proportion between that supply and the foreign demand; and that that demand will continue to govern the price of the home market, whatever may be the increase of the domestic consumption, so long as such an excess beyond that consumption shall continue to be raised. If there was no foreign demand for that surplus—or for any other article which is now extensively exported—either the quantity raised must be diminished in that proportion or the price would fall to the very lowest rate at which the produce can be cultivated. Such has been the invariable result in every part of the country too distant from the seaports to participate in the benefit of the foreign market. The enhanced price of breadstuffs and other exportable articles beyond that minimum is almost exclusively due to the foreign demand and not in any perceptible degree to the increase of manufactures. The statement of prices exhibits no other than those ordinary fluctuations in the foreign demand which have at all times occurred, and does not afford the slightest proof of that permanent improvement in the value of agricultural labor ascribed to the protecting system. For the enhanced price which the farmer obtains for any of his products which continue to be extensively exported he continues to be solely indebted to the foreign market and to commerce.

[From p. 144.]

But in each country the price of labor is determined either by its productiveness or by the proportion between demand and supply in that country, and in no manner whatever by what may be that productiveness or that proportion in any other country, whether there is or is not an intercourse between the two countries. We have heard that Irish laborers, flocking in great numbers to England and Scotland, have by deranging the existing proportion between demand and supply, and by the low rate of wages to which they were used, lowered in certain seasons the price of labor in those two countries; but so long as they remained at home and did not, by transferring their labor to the spot, interfere with that of England, the long-continued intercourse between the two countries never had the slightest effect on the price of English labor, which, varying according to circumstances exclusively belonging to England, has never been reduced to the miserable pittance that hardly sustains, without remunerating, the Irish laborer. This is universally true with respect to every country; the price of labor is in each regulated exclusively by the respective proportion of supply and demand and the state of society.

[From pp. 162–163.]

The only effect that can possibly be ascribed to a protecting duty is that of encouraging the establishment of manufactures which would not otherwise have existed or of inducing a greater number of persons to embark in those already existing. The propriety of the duty depends altogether on the probability of speedy success—that is to say, of the manufacture being so far adapted to the circumstances of the country that, after having been assisted by the duty in surmounting the first difficulties incident to every new undertaking it will be able to sustain itself and without such assistance to compete with the foreign articles.

This leads to the important distinction between a permanent and a temporary protecting duty, the first imposing a perpetual tax for the purpose of perpetuating a continued public loss, the other proper only when the prospect of speedy success is nearly certain. For if necessary to be continued for a long while, the loss continued for a period of years may be greater than the object is worth, and it would have been much wiser to wait until the country was better prepared for commencing the manufacture. The question is how the legislature, on subjects so complex, is to decide whether there is a probability that the result will in a short time be favorable. We answer, first, that whenever the application is for a gradually increasing instead of decreasing rate of duties it is a complete proof that the applicants wish a permanent and not a temporary duty; secondly, that whenever the protecting duty required is exorbitant this likewise clearly proves that there is not any expectation of a speedy favorable result. It is clear that the protection required must be proportionate to the difficulty of establishing the manufacture, and that the country is better prepared for those which require the least protection. A moderate and uniform duty will naturally encourage these, without the necessity of any special legislative interference, whilst those alone will be postponed which, for the very reason that they require a higher protection, ought not yet to be attempted. Instead of an artificial and precarious system the progress will be natural, steady, and permanent.

[From p. 168.]

The important objects more particularly objectionable are:

Hemp, flax, and some of the manufactures of hemp and flax.

Iron, particularly rolled iron, and a few branches of the manufactures of iron.

Wool, particularly of species coarser than any native wool of the United States, and the woolen manufactures embraced by the system of minimums.

Sugar, salt, and coal.

[From p. 169.]

Your memorialists are averse to any duty on the importation of raw materials. [Italics my own.]

[From p. 170.]

The manufacture of cast and bar iron was one of the few which had been established in America under the Colonial Government.

[From p. 176.]

We need not dwell on the injustice and mischievous effects of an exaggregated duty on an article of such general use as iron. It falls upon the farmer, the mechanic, the shipping interest, and on every branch of the iron manufacture, those few excepted which have been embraced by the partial protecting system; and it operates in the most unequal and unjust manner on those parts of the country which have no iron of their own, and might be supplied on cheaper terms under a rational system of moderate duties. The only reason why the extravagant duty is not universally opposed is because the tax thus laid on the agriculturist and the mechanic is spread over such an extent of the country and falls upon so many that the amount paid by each, levied as it is indirectly and in small portions at a time, is not generally understood.

[From p. 186.]

Wool had never been imported free of duty; and when that on woolen manufactures was being increased by the tariff of 1824 it was natural for the agriculturists, whose interest has in every country so often been sacrificed to the combinations of manufacturers, to seek an indemnity in a protecting duty on the corresponding agricultural product. That fixed by the tariff of 1824 was also below the average rate of duties, and not otherwise objectionable than as a tax on a raw material. Experience, however, soon proved that this measure was founded in error, and had depressed instead of promoting the manufacture intended to be protected.

The manufacturers examined by the Committee on Manufactures in 1828 generally agreed in stating that their business was in a more flourishing state before than since the tariff of 1824, and that the unfavorable change was in a great degree due to the increased duty on wool. Some of them asserted that they could manufacture cloth as cheap as in England, provided they could obtain the raw material on the same terms.

[From pp. 187–188.]

It is evident that the only means by which the raising of sheep can be rendered truly profitable is by improving the breed and the quality of the wool. This is what has been done in Prussia, several parts of Germany, and particularly Saxony, under a climate as severe as that of the Middle States, and in many instances in districts where nearly the whole profit arises from the sale of wool. This has also been done without any special protection and with such complete success as to rival and in the finest kinds to supersede in foreign markets the first-rate wools of every other country. There is no reason why the same result may not be obtained in the United States by the same means. There is no reason why the American farmers, decidedly superior in intelligence and activity, should not succeed as well as the inhabitants of a country which enjoys no superior advantage in any other respect.

[From p. 190.]

The object of the woolgrowers is that that market should be enlarged; but this can not be done effectually unless a domestic manufacture is firmly established; and for that purpose it is necessary that the raw material should be obtained on reasonable terms.

REPORT OF THE FINANCES, 1855–1856, JAMES GUTHRIE, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

[From pp. 18 and 19.]

When we first imposed a tax on foreign wool, Great Britain and other manufacturing nations taxed it also, and as high as we taxed it. We discriminated in the tax upon the manufactures of wool, imposing a higher tax upon the finer fabrics; whereupon Great Britain and other manufacturing nations repealed their tax on wool and secured to their manufacturers the advantage of obtaining the raw material free of duty. This advantage over us they will continue to enjoy as long as our tax is continued. The reasons why they admit wool free are to be found in the fact that they manufacture more than they produce, and it is necessary they should be able to sell cheap, in order to enter advantageously the markets of the world, and it may be, also, to secure the market of the United States, to the suppression of manufacturing in this country. We also manufacture more wool than we produce and consume more manufactures of wool than we manufacture, and continue our tax on wool. The duty on wool was imposed to promote its production in the United States, and was expected to enhance the price. It has failed to secure the object for which it was imposed. The production has not kept pace with our population and consumption of woolen manufactures, and although the prices have been fair they have not been such as to make woolgrowing as profitable a pursuit as many others in the country. In the trial of 10 years under the tariff of 1846 there is no greater production of wool, in proportion to the population, than there was prior to that time.

[From p. 26.]

The suggested reduction of the revenue was, by an enlargement of the free list, so as to admit some articles of consumption and the raw materials used by our manufacturers to free entry and lessening the duty on other imports. It was thought that the duties from customs could well be reduced to some forty-eight or fifty millions of dollars and leave an ample sum for all the wants and requirements of the Government, including the redemption of the public debt as it should become due. It seemed to me that good policy required the raw material used in our manufactures to be exempt from duty and our manufacturers placed on an equality with those of Great Britain and other manufacturing nations, who admit the raw material to free entry. A tax upon the raw material is calculated to increase the cost of production by the profits of the importer on the tax on the raw material and the profits of the manufacturer on his outlay for that tax, and the importer's profit thereon, and of the merchant through whom it passes to the consumer, interfering with the manufacturers' enjoyment of both the home and the foreign market, on the same advantageous terms of the manufacturer of other nations, who obtains the raw material free of duty. A single example illustrates this case: Great Britain admits wool, a raw material, free of duty, and the United States imposes upon it a duty of 30 per cent. This enables the English manufacturer to interfere with the American manufacturer in the American markets and to exclude him from the foreign markets. It does more. It surrenders the markets of the countries producing the raw material to the nations who take it free of duty. Our manufacturing and commercial States enjoy the markets of our planting and provision States, because there exists no impeding duty, giving preference to foreign nations; but our manufacturing, commercial, and provision States do not enjoy the markets of Mexico, Central and South America, and the West Indies, nor of other nations inhabiting the shores of the Pacific, because these nations do not manufacture and have but little else for commercial exchange than the raw material, which we tax, and other nations take free of duty in exchange for manufactures and other productions; and, although we are more favorably situated for commercial intercourse with them we yield the trade to the European nations.

[From p. 27.]

The enlargement of the free list and admission of the raw material is suggested as the best and surest mode of giving increased beneficial employment to our tonnage and increased beneficial markets for our manufactures and other products, and of cultivating amity and friendship with our southern neighbors, and also the best mode of promoting our own prosperity next after the mutual free trade we enjoy with each other. Mutual beneficial commerce is all that is required to establish with these nations lasting relations of peace and friendship and remove from their minds all apprehension from our expansion. We should seek commerce and not dominion. When they shall know and feel that commerce alone is our object, and that it is as beneficial to them as to us, we shall win their confidence, and our friendship will be lasting.

REPORT OF THE FINANCES, 1854–1855—JAMES GUTHRIE, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

[From pp. 12 and 13.]

In recommending, for the third time, the remodeling of the schedules of the tariff act of 1846 and the reduction of the revenue from customs, I have felt constrained, by a conviction of its propriety, again to recommend as one of the modes of reducing the revenue that the raw material used in our manufactures should be admitted free of duty.

Under laws of great wisdom and forecast, all manufacturing countries except the United States now admit the raw material used in their productions free of duty, thereby giving constant and profitable employment to capital and labor and enabling their factories to furnish a cheaper article and better to command both the home and foreign market, with beneficial employment to their tonnage in making the exchanges.

The United States, under the Federal Constitution, enjoy perfect freedom of trade with each other in all their agricultural, manufactured, mineral, and other productions. As to the raw material produced in the United States and used in the factories of other countries, those countries, under their laws, obtain the raw material free, whilst we deny to the raw material produced in those countries and used in our factories the same freedom, thus failing to allow the same constant and profitable employment of our capital and labor and the same beneficial occupation of the home and foreign market with cheap articles of our own manufacture and the same beneficial employment of our tonnage in making the exchanges.

The proposed reduction of the revenue by the admission of the raw material used in our manufactures free of duty has the sanction of Congress in the admission of guano, garden seeds, and animals for breed, free of duty, being raw material for the use of agriculturists; also copper ore; felt, adhesive; junk, old; oakum; plaster of Paris, unground; platina, unmanufactured; sheathing copper and sheathing metal; and in the return duty allowed on the exportation of refined sugars, which gives the raw material used by sugar refiners free of duty to the extent the manufactured article is exported. The principle is recognized that taxes should only be levied for the purpose of revenue, and, I think, is clear, inasmuch as the duty is not needed, that the principle would not be violated by authorizing the admission of the raw material used in our manufactures, as proposed, free of duty. It is suggested in contravention of the legislation of other manufacturing countries and as an indirect reduction of taxes on the consumer of the home-manufactured article and may well be considered a step in advance toward free trade.

[From p. 15.]

If the free list shall be adopted, establishing free trade in the raw material, our manufacturers using this raw material and thus placed in equal competition with the manufacturers of other countries will gradually and more and more possess themselves of the home market, exclude the foreign article, and reduce the revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, to come down later, Mr. President, before and after the war we proceeded further to "tinker with the tariff," or to try to, as our friends on the other side are fond of phrasing it. The tariff of 1857 was passed. Remember that. I hope the Senator from Texas will keep that in his mind. The tariff of 1857 provided for many free raw materials. Then, after the war—but I suspect I had better take it chronologically as I go. The Senator from Texas referred to the fact that in 1846 this matter, as he says, "was thrashed out" and that a resolution was offered to put free raw materials upon the bill of 1846 and that that was defeated.

Now, historically that statement of fact is true. But it is not true in the sense in which it would support the position of the Senator from Texas, because the proposition was made by an opponent of the bill when there were only about eight or nine days left of the session, as I remember, and it was made like a great many propositions have been made to amend the reciprocity bill—for the purpose of hampering and hindering and defeating—and the advocates of the bill therefore voted it down.

The Senator from Texas might just as well go out and say that the matter of the Democratic House's farmers' free-list bill has been thrashed out in the Senate here and defeated, because nine-tenths of the Democratic Senators in the Senate are going to vote against it as an amendment upon this bill, believing its effect would be to destroy two things that we wanted, whereas if we did not attach it to the bill only one of the two things that we want would be ultimately destroyed. It is an ordinary thing in parliamentary history for men to vote against things they want in order to save something else that they want, and that happened in connection with that motion in connection with the tariff bill of 1846, and precisely that is going to happen with the Senator's amendment—both amendments which he is offering here—to this reciprocity bill, although Democratic Senators will later vote solidly for both measures in substance as original and independent propositions and although a Democratic House has already voted for both as independent measures.

Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, one of the men who voted against the motion to which the Senator from Texas refers, went on to state that the tax upon raw material was only about 5 per cent, anyhow, and that as far as he was concerned he would just as soon see it out of the bill as in it. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, for after the war: Mr. Morrison, who was the author of the Morrison bill and chairman of a Democratic Ways and Means Committee, used this language in reporting the bill to the House, and the report was unanimous, by the way:

The duties intended to be removed by the bill are chiefly those which tax articles used by our own manufacturers, which subject them to a hopeless competition at home and abroad with the manufacturing nations, none of which taxes such materials, that our own manufacturers may successfully compete, both at home and abroad, with manufacturing nations which do not tax such materials, thus securing markets for the products of hands now idle for want of work to do.

Later on that other great Democrat—from Texas, by the way—the Hon. Roger Q. Mills, was chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, and another Democratic Ways and Means Committee in another unanimous report, of which Roger Q. Mills was author or introducer at that time, used this language:

If we could obtain free of duty such raw materials as we do not produce and can only be procured in foreign countries, and mix with our home product in the various branches of manufacture, we could soon increase our exports several hundred millions. With untaxed raw materials we could keep our mills running on full time, our operatives in constant employment, and have an active demand for our raw materials in our own factories. If there should be no duty on any materials entering into manufactures, many articles now made abroad would be made at home, which, while it would give more employment to our own labor, would give a better market to many articles which we produce and which enter into manufactures, such as cotton, wool, hemp, flax, and others.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Mississippi tell me what he is reading from?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am reading from a speech made by a colleague of the Senator from Texas in the House of Representatives, Judge WILLIAM R. SMITH; but what I have read was not his utterance. They are quotations made by him—the first one from Mr. Morrison and the second one from Mr. Mills.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought that was the speech that had been handed to the Senator from Mississippi by somebody over here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is mistaken if he means it was handed to me to-day, though I know not what that has to do with the debate. Judge SMITH, who is a friend of mine, gave it to me about two weeks ago, and I put it in my desk and pulled it out to-day. So the Senator may not imagine that somebody else has to-day been handing things to me out of enmity to him. The things that I have read are not from Representative SMITH. They are from Morrison, wording one report which was unanimously adopted by a Democratic Ways and Means Committee in the House, and another report drawn by Roger Q. Mills, and also unanimously adopted by another Democratic Ways and Means Committee in the House. Neither Morrison nor Mills can be attacked on the score of not being Democrats or of being at enmity to anybody now living. So the statement that until Cleveland was President the free-raw-material doctrine was never broached by the Democratic party is historically incorrect—first, because Albert Gallatin, under Madison's administration, broached it; second, because Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury under Franklin Pierce's administration, broached it; third, because Robert J. Walker in his letter of 1857 broached it, and Morrison in his report broached it, and Roger Q. Mills in his report broached it, all before the Cleveland tariff was enacted.

I do not agree with the free-raw-material men altogether any more than I altogether agree with antifree-raw-material men.

In fact, I am wedded to no theories, as a practical legislator, from which conditions can not separate me when the public welfare and the practical interest of the whole people demand it. I undertake to do that which seems to me the highest, best, attainable thing to be done in the direction of achievement in which I want to go, regardless of whether the thing is in keeping with any particular theory at the time or not. I say that because I do not want to be understood as indorsing altogether all the things which I have read. The truth is that neither free raw material nor antifree raw material is a hard and fast Democratic doctrine.

The Senator from Texas grows eloquent when he replies to what I said about handicapping the manufacturers by making them pay a tax upon their raw materials when other nations did not thus handicap theirs. The Senator says that "you handicap the farmer when you take the tax off of the free raw material and leave a duty on what he buys," and he tells you that he can not see any difference between handicapping a man by removing a tax and leaving him industrially where God put him without any governmental interference, and handicapping the same man by imposing a tax upon the things that he has to buy, and thereby not leaving him where God put him, but legislatively interfering. The two things are as far apart in my mind as one pole is from the other.

I am not opposed to encouraging industry by untaxing the people either by reductions in toto or by reductions in part. I am as bitterly opposed as the Senator from Texas can possibly be to making the Government a silent partner in somebody's private enterprise, and whether I am right or wrong in that particular, I think I am at least Democratic.

Then the Senator says, "What would be the result if we gave free wool and a 40 per cent duty on woolen goods?" I will tell you what would be the result. By removing the duty upon wool you enable our manufacturers to compete with many other manufacturers in the world. By reducing the duty upon woolen goods from its present rate, which, upon the average, is, I believe, 92 per cent down to 40 per cent, you would force this same manufacturer to meet competition with a price at least that much lower, thus compelling him to give to the people the benefit of the reduction of taxes both on wool and woolens.

Now, it may be that the Republicans are right, and the result might be to force him out of business if you did it all at once; but if he stayed in business and could stay in business he would have to reduce the prices by the amount of the difference between a 40 per cent tax which he could thereafter charge up to the consumer and a 90 per cent tax which he had theretofore charged up to the consumer, while at the same time the reduction of the duty on the wool would enable him to stand the lower price which he would have to make and, in my opinion, remain in business.

Then my friend the Senator from Texas grows eloquent again and says, "If you are going to make the farmer pay a tax upon his suit of clothes and his hat, why not make the manufacturer pay a tax upon his wool?" Because you can not make a manufacturer pay the tax on the wool. That is why. He pays it in the first instance, and then collects it back, and from whom? From the very "poor, downtrodden, poverty-stricken farmer and laborer" the Senator from Texas is fond of talking about. You might just as well talk about a railroad paying for its steel rails. It does not do it. You and I pay for them. It is true the railroads pay for them in the first instance, but they collect them back afterwards, with interest. We pay for them. It is not a question of taxing the manufacturer by the amount of tax upon the raw material except right in the beginning, before the thing gets to working and before a lot of other people, attracted by the increased profits in the business, come into the business and by competition later on bring it around that the price is reduced.

Then the Senator says that I, in saying that when you furnish the manufacturer with free raw material and thereby decrease the cost of his production you thereby increase the profits of his business and thereby increase the number of people going into the business and the amount of capital going into it, and thereby start a competition which in the end brings around a fall of prices, am making the same argument identically that the Republicans make when they start off with the premise that by taxing the finished product you invite people and capital into the business, and in the long run reduce the prices.

Now, if the Senator from Texas had said that the result we both assert is arrived at was the same and that the course of reasoning from the initiative point to the result was the same he would have been more nearly correct; but the result to the country is immensely different.

The Republicans might reach that result of decreased prices, but they do not always reach it for a reason that I will indicate in a moment. They do not generally do it; but when they do they would reach that result by taxing the consumer and all the people on the finished product, while I would reach that result of lower prices by untaxing the people on the raw material which they receive back from the manufacturer. That is the difference. The means are not the same, whether the result be the same or not. The gravamen of his argument was to leave the impression that the method advocated by both of us was the same, while they are exactly opposites.

Now, the reason why the Republican theory will not hold throughout is this: That by merely putting a high duty upon the finished product, while they also have a duty upon the raw material and a duty upon the finished product, pro tanto higher than necessary, because of the duty upon the raw material, the utmost they can hope for from the manufacturers, except under very exceptional circumstances of great advantage, is that the manufacturer can capture and hold the home market. With the immense tax upon the finished product operative behind that tariff shield they can do more than that. The manufacturers can maintain the price pretty nearly up to the tariff-permitted level by combination, and so very frequently the thing falls through—the natural result is defeated.

This much of the Republican argument is correct, and I for one never blink a fact if I know it—a fact is the voice of God, and the only thing you can do to it is to bow down to it and say, "There you are; I can not jump over you; I can not go around you; and I can not tunnel under you."

Ordinarily in the absence of combination, in the absence of any special ability to combine, the encouragement of an industry by making it more profitable to those who engage in it will result in an increased volume of business of that description and an increased number of competitors in that business, and the competition will in a long time and after long and unjust robbery of the consumer result in a decreased price down to a certain level, which is the level of the cost of production plus a living profit; but, of course, if it is done in connection with business where so few people engage in it they can combine, then they will combine and prevent the natural process from taking place.

Again, if this is done in connection with an industry so little adapted to the country where it is being encouraged as that even the law itself can never make that industry produce a sufficiency for the home market, then the cheapening process will never begin, because where the cheapening process begins is after the home market is filled and the surplus must begin to be shipped abroad.

For example, to take a favorite illustration of mine, you could never decrease the price of bananas in America below where foreign bananas are now, because the soil and the climate are naturally so little adapted to the growth of bananas that, no matter what the duty is, they would have to be grown under glass, and being grown under glass they could never be produced as cheaply as they are in the Tropics, where they are not grown under glass. You can never by tariff production of wool bring wool down to the world market price, because there are numbers of countries better adapted to the growth of sheep and the production of wool than we are, and we are in comparison with them so ill adapted to the business that you will never succeed by encouragement of the sheep industry in bringing about a condition where the shepherds of America will raise enough wool for American consumption. You could not do it in England. You could not do it in France. You could not do it in Germany——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unless you made the duty so outrageously exorbitant that nobody would vote for it.

I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator name some countries where the advantages are greater outside of the matter of labor for raising sheep than in America?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I could name several that seem to me to be so. It seems to me Argentina has superior advantages; it seems to me Australia has superior advantages; it seems to me that when you come to the long English combing wool sheep, with the present conditions, Canada for the time being has some advantages; but about that I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator why does he wish to give the manufacturers of wool protection in the way of a customs tariff upon imported woolens? Why not treat them as you do the farmer and let us have free wool and free woolens? Where is the difference?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, would to God that I could, but I can not.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have the Senator tell me why the farmers and their employees are not entitled to the advantages in this country of protection for his product or his labor, as the case may be, just as well as the manufacturer who manufactures cloth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is entitled to it just as much, or, rather, just as little, as anybody else.

Mr. WARREN. Then, why do not you say free woolens as well as free wool?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Simply because I do not want to say at present either free wool or free woolens, because I can not say both, with due regard to needed revenue, and I can not say free everything because of the provision in the Federal Constitution which requires that direct taxes shall be apportioned amongst the several States in accordance with their population. Of course the Senator understands as well as anybody why it is impossible to put everything upon the free list and at the same time administer and carry on the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Then why does the Senator say we should have free wool, as he has said?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not said it.

Mr. WARREN. Then I have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the contrary, I just a moment ago said that a protective duty upon wool will never bring wool up to the point where you can furnish a sufficiency of the supply for the home-market demand. But I have not said that I did not want a revenue duty upon wool. Upon the contrary, I do want a duty of about 20 per cent, and I am going to vote for one. When the Wilson tariff bill was adopted, in 1894, I desired a small duty on wool then, although wool was put on the free list, but I wanted it for revenue purposes. The point I am making is that you can not protect into a home sufficiency of supply a thing like wool, so little adapted in our advanced industrial condition to be raised in our country, in competition.

Mr. WARREN. That is an assertion without proof. I deny that this country can not produce all the wool that is necessary here, with adequate protection to the woolgrower.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will have to accept the denial as an argument, I suppose, and I will have to reply in the only way I can by saying——

Mr. WARREN. The denial stands as good as the assertion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Every bit as good. I have supported the assertion with at least a modicum of argument of an inductive character, which is tolerably good. It is a fact that your protection has not done it with a duty of about 44 per cent upon washed wool, counting 4 pounds of unwashed to 1 pound of washed wool, and if a duty of 44 per cent which you fixed as "adequate" and which has been going on now for 15 years——

Mr. WARREN. And has nearly doubled the number of sheep.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And has increased the gap between the American demand for wool and the American supply of wool—has not done it, and is increasingly failing to do it, then my assertion is supported by the strongest argument—experience, attempt, and failure.

There has been an absolute increase of sheep—not a very large one—and a very large increase of the value of wool—I mean the price of wool, not its value—an increase of price because a part of its price has been the tariff charge; and somewhat of the slight and inadequate increase in the number of the sheep may have been due to tariff stimulation. Sheep have not increased in proportion to our increase in wealth, our increase in production, our increase in population, or even—and that is the point—in proportion to the increased demand of the American people for woolen goods.

Mr. WARREN. There are a great many agricultural products that do not increase as fast as does our population. As to the wheat crop, for instance; would the Senator discontinue the growth of wheat, or would the Senator discontinue the growth of any product for that reason?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; I would not discontinue it. What has that got to do with it? How did the Senator get the idea that I would discontinue the growth of wheat or wool?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator says that the number of sheep and the quantity of wool produced have not kept pace with the population and growth of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I said nothing about discontinuing the production of sheep or wool.

Mr. WARREN. That may be so as to any product; but that is no reason why wool should be refused recognition as a product of the country and not be afforded the same protection as others. To follow the plan and wish of the Senator from Mississippi, woolgrowing in the United States as a business will be discontinued. A few mutton sheep only will be left.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I thought the Senator said a moment ago that there was no reason why we should discontinue raising sheep. Of course, I did not say that. My reason for discontinuing protection is, of course, a double or a treble one.

Mr. WARREN. But the Senator will certainly discontinue the raising of sheep.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think by putting a duty of 20 per cent on wool I am discontinuing or protecting it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, how am I to understand the Senator now—that he does not feel he is offering any protection to wool by giving 20 per cent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not a bit. At least that is not my intention. I am not a protectionist.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator, that he is not a protectionist.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I expected the Senator to agree with me.

Mr. WARREN. And I will say further that I expect we shall have very few, if any, sheep in this country to produce wool, aside from a few mutton sheep to furnish early lambs for the epicures among the city folk. We will then, of course, be reduced to the necessity of obtaining our wool supplies from other countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this country will not cease to produce wool; it will not cease to produce sheep; it may not produce sheep by as great an annual increase as it does now, but every shepherd in this country, including the Senator from Wyoming himself, will get every dollar from raising sheep to which he is entitled in the law of morals, by the law of God, or to which he ought to be entitled by the law of man. If you can not raise sheep at a profit with a 20 per cent advantage over people somewhere else—I regard 20 per cent as a revenue duty, but it has, of course, this incidental protective feature to that extent—if, after giving you the special privilege of taxing me and my labor and the balance of America 20 per cent on every pound of wool you raise, you still can not raise wool in competition with somebody somewhere else, then that is your misfortune and not my crime.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The enormity of the crime of high protection must consist in the excessive amount of the duty; and, taking that view of it, I would like to ask the Senator, who seems to know so much about wool, what would be the proportion of the tax upon cloth and clothes that would go to the woolgrower? Take it in the suit, if you please, or per yard of cloth, and how much actual protection goes to the woolgrower on each suit of clothes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean what percentage of the price of a suit of clothes goes to the woolgrower; how many dollars and cents, for instance, go to the farmer in the present tariff on wool?

Mr. WARREN. I have said on a suit of woolen clothes. How many cents—for of course the woolgrower's portion of the wool tariff hardly reaches the territory of dollars in any single suit of clothes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should say it would depend upon the weight of the goods, the character of the wool, and a great many other things.

Mr. WARREN. Suppose the Senator gives us approximately the maximum and the minimum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not give any average, nor do I care to give any, nor from my standpoint does it make the slightest difference. Whatever may be the increase in the price of a suit of clothes due to the tariff-increased price of the wool that is in it, that increase contains a 44 per cent element right now, which is put there by law, and that I should like to reduce to a 20 per cent element. If the addition was $1, the increase due to taxed wool would be 20 cents; if the addition was $4, the increase would be 80 cents at a 20 per cent tariff rate; but it does not make a bit of difference what the actual amount is; it has nothing to do with the logic of the case; it has nothing to do with the ethics of the case; it has nothing to do with the economics of the case; it has nothing to do with anything except the hothoused prosperity of the woolgrower.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he really believes that the wool industry of the United States will thrive under the 20 per cent tariff which he proposes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but I do not believe it will thrive to the extent it does with this hothouse help and encouragement at the expense of others by the Government. Mr. President, I try to be frank and honest in arguing, as well as I can. If the Senator wants me to admit that a protective duty levied for the purpose of helping an individual enterprise does help it, I answer "yes." My objection to that is that it helps it at the expense of other enterprises and of other people; that it, by law, withdraws, invites and forces withdrawal, of labor and capital from naturally profitable pursuits into pursuits in themselves unprofitable, but which are made profitable, if at all, by law; and that that sort of artificial abstraction of capital and labor from a naturally profitable pursuit to one that is not naturally profitable is always a national loss.

I admit that I could start a banana industry and a pineapple industry in America and make them highly profitable to capital engaged in them and to the labor employed by the capital; but after I had done it and somebody carried me there and pointed it out to me and said, "Look at this glorious benefit of the tariff, 10 square miles under glass, bananas ripening everywhere, capital earning 20 per cent, labor paid $2 a day or $3.50 a day, a great fruit of the protective tariff," and I should be asked, "Do you deny, Mr. WALLIAMS, that this is a profitable pursuit?" then I would shock the Senator from Wyoming by saying, "Yes; I deny that it is a profitable pursuit; I do not deny that it is profitable to the capital and the man engaged in it, but it is not profitable to the people of the United States." There is a necessary law that has been infringed and a necessary national loss incurred by this legislative interference with the freedom of industry.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's idea of——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, by the way, in that connection, just excuse me for one other thing, because I want to say it right here, for fear I shall forget it, and then I am going to yield to the Senator again. I hear very much about protection being "equal." There is no protectionist under the sun who would vote for a protective tariff that is equal in its bearing on everybody. In the first place, you can not make it equal, because there are some things which, from the very nature of them and the fact that they are immensely exported, can not be protected to the extent of causing a rise in their prices, but if you could levy an equal-bearing protective-tariff system of duties, a protective tariff of such a character as to put one dollar additional to what he now gets into the pocket of each cotton planter, one into the pocket of each wheat farmer, one into the pocket of each woolgrower, one into the pocket of each lumberman, one into the pocket of each miner, one into the pocket of each laborer, and one other dollar into the pocket of each manufacturer, what would you have done when you got through? You would have a system of taxes by which you would take one dollar from all the people of the United States and give it to one fellow, another dollar from everybody and give it to another fellow, and so through the whole population, taking one from all and giving one to each, and when you got through you would have taken from each man exactly the same amount that you gave back to him less the cost of the collection and disbursement. Nobody wants a protective tariff, except for the special advantage which it gives. If it operated equally as an advantage and equally as a burden on each and every man, nobody would be assinine enough to want it, because it would be merely swapping dollars with everybody everywhere, less the cost of collection, administration, and disbursement.

"Equal rights to all and special privileges to none!" The only reason upon which a protective tariff was ever advocated was that somebody thought it was a special privilege to some special industry. If the privilege and power of collecting taxes by increased prices from the people were equally distributed to every man, woman, and child in the United States, nobody would be fool enough to want it. There is no such thing as a tariff bearing equally upon all producers and all consumers, and if such a tariff could be constructed nobody would want it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator is hastening along and I, of course, would not interrupt him, except that I want to get the Senator's idea about the revenue to be derived from the duty which he would place on wool. He assumes that 20 per cent is about right as a revenue tariff on wool?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's computation of what that will produce per year in the next 10 years?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe that in 5 or 10 years from now a 20 per cent duty upon wool will produce as much revenue as a 44 per cent duty does now.

Mr. WARREN. And that will be produced by the American ceasing, substantially, to produce sheep.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That will be produced by the stimulation of American woolen manufactures by the increased amount of capital going into them, by the increased amount of wool used by them, by the increased amount of labor employed by them, and, generally, by the increased volume of business.

Mr. WARREN. Will there be more people wearing woolen goods? And will they wear out more clothing, just doubling their consumption for very joy, the same as we would eat twice as much food if it were half as cheap?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There undoubtedly will be. There will not be more people, except by the natural increase in population, but there will be a great many people wearing wool then that are wearing something they buy for wool now that is not wool.

By the way, in that connection, there is nothing that cuts so many queer capers as a duty. I have said for years that the duty on wool did not do the wool raiser of this country the amount of good that he thought it did, but that it did the cotton planter a great deal of good that he never dreamed of. Why? Because it encourages men in competing with one another to sell cheap clothing, to put a good deal of cotton into so-called woolen goods, thereby increasing the demand for cotton just to that extent, and to that extent—small, perhaps—but still to that extent stiffening the price of cotton.

Mr. WARREN. The answers of the Senator to my questions are so long and cover so much outside territory that I will not pursue the interrogatories any further now, but at some other time I will bring up the matter of how much the people will probably receive and how they will receive it under a 20 per cent tariff on wool as a revenue measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator would tell me now the number of pounds of importations of wool into the United States, and then would multiply that by 24, he would arrive at a result which would be my estimate of what the people would save by reducing the duty from 44 to 20 cents a pound on wool.

Mr. WARREN. That is, the people would use twenty-four times as much wool as now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Twenty-four cents multiplied by as much wool as is imported by the pound would be the saving to the people.

Mr. WARREN. Well, we imported something less than 300,000,000 pounds—anywhere between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 pounds in different years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That multiplied by 24 cents would be about one-fourth of $300,000,000, would it not? Twenty-four cents times 300,000,000 is $72,000,000 is it not, if your figures are correct, and if the new duty is to be 20 cents and the present duty is 44 cents, and if your figures are for washed wool imported? If figures are of unwashed wool, about one-fourth of $72,000,000. But that is not all that the people would save, because the people would not only save the difference between what they are paying now on the wool that is actually imported and what they would pay then, but they would also save that same difference on what they are now paying on wool that is bought from the Senator from Wyoming and other woolgrowers.

Mr. WARREN. Three hundred million pounds of wool is more than is being imported now. Whatever the value of that wool may be, the duty on it at present yields about $21,000,000. If the Senator will figure how many million pounds of wool will have to come in at the ordinary prices to produce $21,000,000, he will see that we would have to stimulate the trade by multiplying several times over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The importations now are about $21,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. About that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then just take twenty-four forty-fourths of that amount and you have got what the people would save. If the duty on wool was reduced twenty-four forty-fourths, that is what they would save upon the wool actually imported. Then, if you take the save figures, twenty-four forty-fourths, and take the amount of wool that the American woolgrowers sell to the American manufacturer and the manufacturer sells to the American people and arrive at that and add the two results together you have got the whole thing—if the figures all around are right. I do not now what they are.

Mr. WARREN. Without going into figures, I will say to the Senator that he must first destroy the American woolgrower, and then he must greatly increase the consumption of wool in order to get his $21,000,000 of revenue from raw wool at 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought that the Senator said that the present duties amounted to $21,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. I did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Then what I said was that what the American consumer would save would be twenty-four forty-fourths of that amount. That would not be $21,000,000, of course, but about half of that amount. Suppose, however, that the importations were stimulated until they increased 100 per cent, then you would get back into the Treasury the same amount of revenue that you get now—virtually, not exactly—because 44 is a little over twice 20.

Mr. WARREN. You would not get that amount then, even after destroying the woolgrowers of America.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it were half you would; but it is twenty-four forty-fourths.

Mr. WARREN. It is not half.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Say half, just for the sake of the calculation. Then, if you double the imports with half of the duty, of course you get the same revenue that you get from the old duty with half of the imports.

Mr. SMOOT. What will you do with the American product if you are going to double the imports?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the American product take care of itself, with no special privilege except the 20 cents, with a fair opportunity and in a free field.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, what I was going to say——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the Senator from Utah talking about? What does he do with the cotton producer? Does he not have less than a fair opportunity and a free field, and has he been crushed out of existence?

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about the absolute facts. If you are going to import twice the amount of wool that is imported to-day—the amount being 262,000,000 pounds last year—that will be 524,000,000 pounds, about as much wool as is now used in American mills. If you are going to import that amount you will have to ship the home-produced wool to some foreign market.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Utah argueth strangely.

Mr. SMOOT. I argue from the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He leaves out the factor upon which the entire argument is based, which is the stimulation of the woolen-manufacturer's business in the United States and the increased consumption of wool. If he will multiply the producing capacity of the woolen manufacturers of the United States by two, then he can see how the importations might be doubled, even if the American wool producer sold as much as he ever did before.

Mr. SMOOT. A theory is a nice thing to talk about, but it never works out in practice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, that is a mere side remark, a fling, that is about as far away from either inductive or deductive ratiocination as a man could possibly land himself by a deliberative effort. All sound theories work out in practice. Mere hypotheses or alleged or unsound theories may not or do not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we doubled our importations I think we would then be importing just about all the wool we consume and about all the wool we need.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not if the demand for the wool increased by the stimulation of the woolen industry; and if the demand for wool did not increase, as I anticipate, by the stimulation of the woolen industry, your present home production would come as near meeting it as it does now. But my theory is, that if the stimulation of the woolen industry did not take place, of course the importations would not increase either, but I have been presuming that it would take place. I desire to be perfectly frank. I understood what the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] wanted. He wanted me to admit that I did not regard a 20 per cent duty as sufficient protection to keep up the present price of wool, and I admit that. I would be a fool to stand here and argue for a reduction of taxes upon any other ground in the world than that it would decrease the price of the thing upon which the tax had been levied; but I take it for granted that if you decrease the price of the article upon which the tax is levied that will also increase the demand for the article by increasing its uses, and that the increase of the demand for the article would have some tendency to steady it and to carry its price up somewhat later on. I admit, if you want me to admit for Republican political purposes—and you are welcome to the admission—that the reduction of the duty upon wool will decrease the price of wool.

Mr. GALLINGER. And increase the importations, the Senator thinks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course; that is the way it would decrease the price. If there were no increased importations, you could not decrease the price, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the importations were increased and the woolen industry should be destroyed in this country, what price——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but I was saying that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Assuming that to be the fact——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not assume that to be the fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume it to be the fact. If that were so, what price would the foreigner ask for his wool when he got possession of our market?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, I come to one of the very common fallacies of the whole protection argument. I am astonished——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator discovers a great many fallacies, provided they do not agree with his fallacies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do. I discover a great many; and I expect, being thoroughly fallible, absolutely fallible, that I indulge in a great many of them myself. The only difference is, I never indulge in a sophistry. I have sometimes fallen into a fallacy.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has told us a great many times that he is always fair-minded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But what I was going to call attention to is this: The Senator is proceeding upon the idea that all the woolgrowers in the world somewhere are to be designated as "the foreigner," and when the foreigner finds out that he has got the American market the foreigner just chuckles and raises his prices.

Mr. GALLINGER. That always happens.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is the idea the Senator is proceeding upon; but, in the first place, Mr. President, we do not deal with "the foreigner"; we never have dealt with "the foreigner." He does not exist. His name is legion. There are millions of him. He can not consult with himself. He competes with himself and his self-competition takes care of prices. There are too many of him to fix a price. The United States never dealt with Germany, it never dealt with France, and it never dealt with Australia since the world began, nor did any of them ever deal with us, much less did we ever deal with "the foreigner." I know that certain subjects or citizens of theirs produce certain things and sell them to certain citizens of ours.

Mr. GALLINGER. And get the highest price they can get.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And certain citizens of ours produce things and sell them to them at the highest prices that they can get, and the purchasers in each case buy them at the lowest prices they can. Competition among buyers and among sellers as a price regulator is not destroyed by the fact that some of the buyers or sellers are foreigners; it is broadened.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Buyers buy at the least they can and sellers sell at the highest price they can get.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in the haggling of the market the price is fixed. The theory that a nation deals with a nation is absurd.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not assert that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator asserted something worse. He said, what is the foreigner going to do, and the assumption under the bottom of it was that there was somewhere some entity known as the foreigner, who could raise the price of his wool product because of what?

Mr. GALLINGER. Because he has our market.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because we had increased the demand for it. If that was true, it would be raised to that extent, but he could no more increase the price of his wool to sell to us than he can increase the price of his wool to sell to Great Britain and Germany and France now. He has already increased it as much as the market will permit and as much as the competitors upon the buying side of their business can admit, and that is all he could do then, except in so far as an increased demand might justify an increased price.

Now, the difference between me and the Senator is plain and palpable. There is no use beating around the bush. What he is trying to do is to get a duty that legislatively hothouses production and prices. In this particular case it legislatively hothouses sheep raising for the benefit of the various American shepherds, from the humblest up to the loftiest sitting in the highest place. What I am denying the right of any government to do is just exactly that thing, except I would fix it so that a nation could raise its war material necessary for self-defense in its own borders. That is where Calhoun went, and I will go that far.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked the Senator a question two or three hours ago that he did not answer. Now, he has got wool down to a revenue basis. Does the Senator think that the duty on rice is at a revenue basis at the present time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am rather inclined to think it is above the revenue basis. And, by the way, upon that subject I am rather inclined to think that even from the protectionist's standpoint American rice does not need a particle of protection. That is not all.

I want to tell you something else. When the Cuban reciprocity bill was up, and I was advocating it and various Democrats were resisting it, the cry that went up about the absolute ruin of the rice industry was most distressing. One of the best friends I ever had stood on the floor of the House of Representatives and said if we had Cuban reciprocity the rice industry of Louisiana and of Texas would be ruined. Another one from the State of Texas said substantially the same thing, the first one being from Louisiana. They went so far as to say when we later took up the Philippine free-trade bill that the same result would follow that. It had not followed upon Cuban reciprocity, but they said it would follow here. I said to one of them: "My dear boy, do you think that an anemic, half-starved Filipino, with a water buffalo for motive power and a crooked stick for a plow, can raise rice in successful competition with the highly organized industry in Texas and Louisiana?" He said: "I am certain of it." He then went on to say: "So much Philippine rice will come in, mighty near the whole crop." I said: "My dear boy, you forget that the Filipinos live chiefly on rice."

Mr. GALLINGER. And then import rice into the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They live chiefly on rice. The Senator's unrequested and ungranted interruption makes the position all the more ridiculous. So I reckon I ought to welcome it. I said they have got to live on rice. They have got to raise enough to eat before they can send out any at all, and they were not doing even that at that particular time, but I presumed that later on they would. "Oh," he said, "they will raise rice and send their rice to us, and then they will import cheap rice for themselves from China." By the way, I noticed a mistake in the RECORD the other day. I referred to this same argument in a speech the other day, and I had a slip of the tongue and said "Canada," or the stenographer had a slip of the pen and made it read "Canada." But I meant "China," and that is what my friend said. Time has passed. At that time reciprocity was exciting the terror and the alarm of the southern farmer. I voted for it anyhow, and they have not been hurt, and the things that they said would take place have not taken place.

I remember that the sugar-beet men came down here before the Ways and Means Committee and said then Cuban reciprocity and free trade with the Philippines would just absolutely close up every sugar-beet factory in the Northwest. You will remember I had put into the testimony of the Ways and Means Committee the report from the Agricultural Department showing that the sugar-beet industry has increased enormously; I think it was something like 400 per cent. So they have not been closed up.

Why, my friends, men in religion, men in trades, men in politics have been afraid of freedom ever since the world began. God Almighty seems to be the only being anywhere who is not afraid of freedom and not afraid to give it to His creatures. He gives it to such an extent that He lets us go wrong if we will—even to that extent. From the beginning religious bigots have been afraid of it, political bigots have been afraid of it, and industrial bigots have been afraid of it. And yet whenever it comes we find it stimulates human enterprise, human intelligence, human ambition, and human industry to such an extent that it more than compensates for what seems to be the plain and palpable and obvious immediate losses by it.

Now, Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its kind attention.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the report of Robert J. Walker, made to Congress in December, 1845, which was his first report, printed in the RECORD, because it flatly contradicts the letter which the Senator from Mississippi has just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. BAILEY. It is proper for me to say further that when that letter was written Mr. Walker was no longer a Democrat, and he was holding, or had held for several years, a position under a Republican administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will yield, I know he does not want to leave a wrong impression. Mr. Walker was in every respect, except the suppression of the Confederacy and his adherence to the Union, as much a Democrat when he died as he was in 1846. He voted with the Republican Party solely upon the Union question and held office under Lincoln, as many other northern Democrats did, upon that issue.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will examine that letter he will find that Walker claimed in it to be the author of the national banking system, which was essentially a Republican policy, and which Democrats had generally opposed. I can hardly allow the claim of the Senator from Mississippi that Walker was a Democrat, while Walker himself was claiming to be an author of an important and distinctively Republican measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think the national banking act was Democratic, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. BAILEY. Democrats almost unanimously opposed it at that time, and a majority of them have opposed it since that time.

But, Mr. President, the most singular thing about this proceeding, and the thing which surprises me most, is that the Senator from Mississippi would read that letter to the Senate, because its statement that in his first report to Congress Walker had recommended free raw materials is a positive and palpable falsehood. I have read that report more than once, and I declare that there is not one syllable in it recommending free raw material.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a fact.

Mr. BAILEY. But Walker says in that letter which the Senator from Mississippi has just read that he did recommend free raw material in that report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no. He said "in his first report"——

Mr. BAILEY. That is his first report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Texas will forgive me one minute more—I realize I have interrupted him too much——

Mr. BAILEY. That is all right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I realize that both of us have burdened the Senate. But the Senator will agree with me that the most charitable construction to put upon the acts and utterances of men if allowable is the proper one to place there. I imagine that what Mr. Walker means by that is that in his first draft which he had contemplated sending to Congress he had wanted to recommend free raw material, but was kept from it by the opposition of Mr. Calhoun. And certainly it is more charitable to suppose that than to assert that he was "a liar," now that the man is not here to explain what he did mean. It seems to me plain that that is what the man meant, because that is the only thing he could have meant consonant with the truth.

Mr. BAILEY. He could not have meant that, because the Senator will remember that Mr. Calhoun was not on good terms with either Walker or with Polk. Mr. Calhoun had broken with the Jackson administration, and Polk was Jackson's candidate for the Presidency. Not only so, but Walker was the man who secured the nomination of Polk at Baltimore. Martin Van Buren had enough delegates to that convention instructed for him, together with the uninstructed delegates who favored his nomination, to nominate him on the first ballot, and Robert J. Walker was the man who contrived to defeat Van Buren, and thus accomplished the nomination of Mr. Polk. It is probably true that Calhoun cared less for Van Buren than he did for Polk, for he distrusted Van Buren on the slavery question. The explanation suggested by the Senator from Mississippi can not be accepted, because no man who is familiar with the history of that time can ever be persuaded to believe that John C. Calhoun could have forced a Secretary of the Treasury under Polk's administration, and least of all when that Secretary was Robert J. Walker, to completely reverse his annual report upon any phase of the paramount issue of that day.

I am furthermore unwilling to adopt the charitable view suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, because I know that Walker deliberately circulated an outrageous falsehood against the most distinguished man who ever represented the State of Mississippi in the Congress of the United States. Robert J. Walker accepted an appointment as a special agent of the Federal Government to Great Britain, and represented both to the Government and to the financiers of that country that Jefferson Davis had been responsible for the repudiation of the public debt of Mississippi, and yet Walker knew as well as any man living that when the public debt of Mississippi was repudiated Mr. Davis had never taken any active part in the politics of that State, and afterwards favored an honorable settlement of that debt.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Texas will permit me, because it is an interesting historic fact, I did not know that Robert J. Walker had ever made that representation.

Mr. BAILEY. He made it, and Mr. Davis bitterly resented it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If he did, he made an absolutely false representation. The Senator from Texas could emphasize further what he has just said by saying that when Jefferson Davis did run in Warren County for the legislature the chairman of the Democratic executive committee of the State of Mississippi undertook to read him out of the party because he was not in favor of the action of the Democratic legislature concerning those bonds. The Senator might add further that when Sergeant S. Prentiss was selected by the Whigs to meet Jefferson Davis upon the stump, because the Whig nominee for legislator could not do it, they met and agreed that they would leave out of the discussion all the things concerning which they agreed, and they agreed that they agreed upon the bond-issue question. You will remember that Sergeant S. Prentiss was so bitterly opposed to what Mississippi did in connection with that that he left the State and went to New Orleans. Yet he and Davis agreed that they had no point of discussion between them.

I am glad the Senator has mentioned that, because a distinguished ex-President of the United States repeated that erroneous statement about Mr. Davis and so-called Mississippi "repudiation" in a book which he wrote—I think the life of Thomas H. Benton; or in one of them at any rate—and he seems to have gotten his authority from Winfield Scott's autobiography.

By the way, I will add that a corporal in my grandfather's company in the Mexican War, in the regiment of which Jefferson Davis was colonel, and afterwards a colonel in the Confederate Army, told me once that my grandfather told him that "the only thing he ever knew Mr. Davis to do that was wrong was siding with the Whigs on the bond question." My grandfather did not think it was repudiation, and I do not, by the way. The truth of the matter was that the constitution of Mississippi forbade the pledging of the credit of the State for private institutions, and the Whig government pledged it anyhow. The people elected a Democratic legislature that undid it and left the world to call it repudiation or whatever it pleased.

Mr. BAILEY. As to a part of those bonds, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi. There was a part of them for which the State never made any provision, although it never expressly repudiated them.

The fact that Walker was guilty of that gross misrepresentation—and that he was guilty of it is beyond all question—renders it impossible for me either to believe him or to put a charitable construction upon what he has said even in another connection.

Walker wrote that letter with great deliberation, and in it he claims for himself a credit beyond what would be granted to most men in that day or in this day; and it is impossible for me to suppose that he intended to say one thing but said distinctly and pointedly another thing. That report is the one thing for which Walker is remembered. Except for it, and the bill which was drawn in accordance with it, he would long since have been forgotten, and I can not believe that he could have confused what he might have desired to say with what he actually did say. Not only that, but the report directly and specifically condemns the act of 1842 because it levied "higher duties upon the manufactured fabric than upon the agricultural product out of which it is made." In view of that unequivocal condemnation of the doctrine of free raw material, we must believe, if we believe Walker's letter, that Mr. Calhoun not only made Walker omit what he wanted to say on that subject, but made him declare for a distinctly contrary policy. Will the Senator from Mississippi ask us to believe that? No, Mr. President, Walker did not, either in the first or in the last draft of his first report, recommend free raw material. But, sir, while I do not believe the explanation offered by the Senator from Mississippi is correct, even if accepted it would not be sufficient to refute my argument. Indeed, it would strongly support my contention, because it would show that the party organization overruled Mr. Walker's individual views, and not only compelled him to rewrite his report, but then constructed its tariff bill in accordance with that report as thus rewritten. That letter has been used many times, and for years I did not believe it was genuine, because I could not find a copy of it, and it was so flatly in the face of the report, which was an official record, that I could not believe that Walker had written it; but I finally found a copy of it in the Library, and I think this contradiction ought to go with it in the RECORD.

The Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me, if he understood me to say that no Democrat ever advocated the doctrine of free raw materials. I know all about the Gallatin memorial and I know about the Guthrie report. There have been Democrats from time to time who have advocated direct protection by duties as well as indirect protection through free raw material; but it was not an isolated or an individual opinion upon which I challenged the Senators statement of our position, and if he will examine the RECORD he will find that I said he could find no warrant of the Democratic Party for saying what he had said. The fact that Gallatin made that recommendation in the celebrated memorial which he drew and that our party did not follow it, and the fact that Guthrie made his recommendation and that our party did not follow it, are sufficient to support my statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did not the party follow it in 1857—all the Democrats in both Houses?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the tariff act of 1857?

Mr. BAILEY. That act did not put raw materials on the free list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not all of them, but many, very many of them.

Mr. BAILEY. It greatly enlarged the free list and it greatly reduced all the duties, but it did not put all raw materials on the free list. For instance, it put the cheaper wool on the free list and left the better wool on the dutiable list. Besides, the Senator from Mississippi must not forget that the act of 1857 reduced many of the duties as low as 4½ per cent, and when we reach the point where we can reduce all tariff duties to a level with the act of 1857 I shall not quarrel with my colleagues about whether particular articles are on one list or on the other.

I feel that out of this controversy has at least come some advantage, for the Senator from Mississippi has declared that he is not in favor of the doctrine of free raw materials. It is true he complains that some of us are unduly opposed to it, but real Democrats will not find any serious fault with us for our insistent opposition to it, if it is wrong. If the Senator from Mississippi can make other Democrats quit talking in favor of it, he will relieve me from the necessity of talking against it, and I shall be delighted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am afraid I would be just as helpless on one side as on the other. The only thing I can do is to vote with the crowd that happens to be attacking a protectionist duty at the time. If it is a finished product, I will vote with the Senator from Texas. If it is a raw material, I will vote the other way.

Mr. BAILEY. That haphazard method of dealing with tariff duties may suit the Senator from Mississippi; but he can not justify it upon any Democratic principle, for it disregards the vital question of the equality of taxation as between our different sections and various industries. No matter how anxious I am to reduce tariff duties, I will not vote to reduce them in a way which will still further increase the advantage of those who are now, and have been for a century, the chief beneficiaries of the system. By every consideration of justice and fairness we are required to equalize as well as to reduce the burdens of taxation; and instead of laying a 20 per cent duty on wool and a 42 per cent duty on woolen clothes, we ought to lay a 30 per cent duty on each, thus reducing the tax on those who must buy clothes for the sake of decency and comfort and increasing the tax on those who buy wool purely for the sake of profit; and if there must be a difference, it ought to be in favor of the toiling millions who must wear clothes rather than in favor of the prosperous thousands who manufacture clothes.

The Senator from Mississippi says that nobody wants a protective tariff equally applied, and I am very much inclined to agree with him in that opinion; but the Senator and myself want a revenue tariff as equally applied as possible, do we not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but I do not mean by that with equal rates.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because one rate on one commodity might be prohibitive and the same rate on another might be barely a revenue duty.

Mr. BAILEY. No Democrat ever suggested that the duty on calico should be as high as the duty on silk. There is in Walker's report, and also in Polk's message, the wisest and safest rule ever laid down for our guidance, and that rule requires us in levying tariff duties to assimilate them as nearly as possible to a tax on property. Their theory was that those articles the purchase and consumption of which imply the possession of wealth ought to bear the heaviest tax, while those articles the purchase and consumption of which do not imply the possession of wealth ought to be subject to the lowest tax.

There is another difference between the Senator from Mississippi and myself. He keeps saying that he wants to leave man like God made him. He can not do that in a civilized country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that. In that case a man would be left a savage. What I said was, I wanted to leave man with no industrial advantages in competing with others except such as God gives him. I would not make a savage of him.

Mr. BAILEY. Even stated in that way I can not join the Senator from Mississippi, because I recognize that in levying tariff duties to raise money for the support of the Government it is impossible to avoid certain burdens and certain advantages. We can not leave all men where God placed them in matters of government, and I propose, as far as possible, to place each man as much in the same position as the law obliges me to place every other man. In other words, if I am compelled to tax one man for the purpose of raising money to support the Government, then I insist on taxing every man who is able to pay a tax. I would tax no man above the point which the revenue necessities of the Government require, but up to that point I would tax every man according to his ability to pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, for fear that what was said may be misunderstood, the Senator does not mean that he would at once and in one act cut down to a revenue basis all the duties?

Mr. BAILEY. If I had been permitted to write this bill I would have made a reduction——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not talking about the bill. I am now on the general question.

Mr. BAILEY. I will answer that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, now and then a vested wrong gets to be a vested right.

Mr. BAILEY. Never, in my opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It gets to where a man is put in a position where you ruin him, of course, if you take his stimulant away from him too quick. The thing I am trying to get at is this: I think you do not want the country to understand that the just thing, in the very first act, is to go to a revenue basis upon all questions. I think the country expects of us to treat legislation with some regard as to what the actual conditions are. I do not think the Senator meant that, but I was afraid that other people might misunderstand him. It seems to me that we have got to withdraw some of the stimulant from the patient gradually.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if there were any probability that I would have been misunderstood, I am obliged to the Senator from Mississippi for giving me the opportunity to state exactly what I believe about that, and it is briefly this: If I had been in control of this matter I would have made a complete tariff bill, because I think we will find some difficulty in revising the tariff schedule by schedule. For instance, we have a bill revising the woolen schedule here now, and yet there are many things used in the manufacture of woolen goods which are included in other schedules, such as woolen-goods machinery, and so forth; and it will be extremely difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to adjust any of these duties fairly without readjusting all of them. Therefore, if I could have had my way I would have made a complete revision; and I would have made an average reduction equal at least to one-third of the existing duties. I would then have put into immediate effect one-third of that reduction, or 10 per cent, at once, and I would have put the other 20 per cent in effect at a certain annual rate extending over two or four years. I think that would have permitted every man to readjust his business without serious disturbance, but in its wisdom that body to which the Constitution confides the origination of revenue bills saw fit to proceed the other way, and I intend, so far as I can, to follow their lead, and in the two amendments which I have offered to the pending bill I have practically followed the two bills on those subjects which the other House has already passed.

APPENDIX.

REPORT OF HON. ROBERT J. WALKER.

[House of Representatives, Treasury Department. Document No. 6. Twenty-ninth Congress, first session.]

FINANCE—ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1846–47.

Report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, etc.

December 3, 1845. Read and laid upon the table, and 100 extra copies of the report ordered to be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 3, 1845.

In obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department," the undersigned respectfully submits the following report:

The receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1845, were as follows:

RECEIPTS AND MEANS.

From customs	$27,528,112.70
From sales of public lands	2,077,022.30
From miscellaneous sources	163,998.56
Total receipts	29,769,133.56
Add balance in the Treasury July 1, 1844	7,857,379.64
Total means	37,626,513.20
The expenditures during the same fiscal year amounted to the sum of	29,968,206.98
Leaving a balance in the Treasury on July 1, 1845, of	7,658,306.22

The estimated receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1846, are as follows:

RECEIPTS.

From customs, first quarter, by actual returns of the collectors	$8,861,932.14
For second, third, and fourth quarters, as estimated	15,638,067.86
Total from customs	24,500,000.00
From sales of public lands	2,200,000.00
From miscellaneous and incidental sources	120,000.00
Total receipts	26,820,000.00
Add balance in the Treasury on July 1, 1845	7,658,306.22
Total means, as estimated	34,478,306.22

EXPENDITURES.

The actual expenditures for the first quarter ending Sept. 30, 1845, amounted to the sum of	$8,463,092.41
The estimated expenditures for the public service during the other three quarters, from Oct. 1, 1845, to June 30, 1846, are as follows, viz:
Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous purposes	6,739,211.06
Army proper	2,594,735.06
Fortifications, ordnance, arming militia, etc	2,346,778.82
Indian department	1,649,791.94
Pensions	1,356,556.02
Interest on public debt and treasury notes	856,976.48
Redemption of the residue of the loan of 1841	29,300.00
Treasury notes which are yet outstanding, and payable when presented	687,764.18
Naval establishment	4,902,845.93
		[1] 29,627,031.90
Which deducted from the total of means before stated, leaves in the Treasury on July 1, 1846, an estimated balance of		4,851,254.32

But this balance is subject to be decreased by such additional appropriations as Congress shall make, to be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1846, and to be altered by the sums which may be presented for payment of the old funded and unfunded debt and old Treasury notes.

The estimated receipts, means, and expenditures for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1846, and ending June 30, 1847, are as follows:

RECEIPTS.

From customs for the four quarters	$22,500,000.00
From sales of public lands	2,400,000.00
From miscellaneous and incidental sources	100,000.00
Total revenue	25,000,000.00
Add estimated balance to be in the Treasury on July 1, 1846	4,851,254.32
Total means for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1847	29,851,254.32

EXPENDITURES.

The expenditures during the same period, as estimated by the several departments of State, Treasury, War, Navy, and Postmaster General, viz:
The balances of former appropriations which will be required to be expended in this year	$1,441,457.10
Permanent and indefinite appropriations	2,997,915.72
Specific appropriations asked for this year	21,079,440.43
Total estimated expenditure		25,518,813.25

[1] The sum of $1,548,997 for supplying deficiency of revenue for postage, and also $300,000 for postages of Congress and of executive offices, are included in the above sum of $29,627,051.90.

This sum is composed of the following particulars:

For civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	[1] $5,925,292.62
For Army proper	3,364,458.92
For fortifications, ordnance, arming militia, etc	4,331,809.93
For pensions	2,507,100.00
For Indian Department	2,214,916.18
For naval establishment	6,339,390.88
Interest on public debt	835,844.72
	$25,518,813.25

Which deducted from the total of means before stated gives an estimated balance on July 1, 1847, of 4,332,441.07

The receipts for the first quarter of this year are less by $2,011,885.90 than the receipts of the same quarter last year. Among the causes of decrease is the progressive diminution of the importation of many highly protected articles and the substitution of rival domestic products. For the nine months ending June 30, 1843, since the present tariff, the average of duties upon dutiable imports was equal to 37.84/100 per cent; for the year ending June 30, 1844, 33.85/100 per cent; and for the year ending June 30, 1845, 29.90 per cent, showing a great diminution in the average percentage, owing in part to increased importation of some articles bearing the lighter duties and decreased importation of others bearing the higher duty.

The revenue from ad valorem duties last year exceeded that realized from specific duties, although the average of the ad valorem duties was only 23.57 per cent, and the average of the specific duties 41.30, presenting another strong proof that lower duties increase the revenue. Among the causes tending to augment the revenue are increased emigration and the annexation of Texas. The estimates for the expenditures for 1846 are based chiefly upon appropriations made by Congress. The estimated expenditures of 1847 are founded upon data furnished by the several departments and are less by $4,108,238.65 than those of the preceding year.

These estimates are submitted in the full conviction that whenever Congress, guided by an enlightened economy, can diminish the expenditures without injury to the public interest, such retrenchment will be made, so as to lighten the burden of taxation and hasten the extinguishment of the public debt, reduced on the 1st of October last to $17,075,445.52.

In suggesting improvements in the revenue laws the following principles have been adopted:

First. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth. That all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

Sixth. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

No horizontal scale of duties is recommended, because such a scale would be a refusal to discriminate for revenue and might sink that revenue below the wants of the Government. Some articles will yield the largest revenue at duties that would be wholly or partially prohibitory in other cases. Luxuries, as a general rule, will bear the highest revenue duties; but even some very costly luxuries, easily smuggled, will bear but a light duty for revenue, whilst other articles, of great bulk and weight, will bear a higher duty for revenue. There is no instance within the knowledge of this department of any horizontal tariff ever having been enacted by any one of the nations of the world. There must be discrimination for revenue or the burden of taxation must be augmented in order to bring the same amount of money into the Treasury. It is difficult, also, to adopt any arbitrary maximum to which an inflexible adherence must be demanded in all cases. Thus, upon brandy and spirits, a specific duty, varying as an equivalent ad valorem from 180 to 261 per cent, yields a large revenue; yet no one would propose either of these rates as a maximum. These duties are too high for revenue, from the encouragement they present for smuggling these baneful luxuries; yet a duty of 20 per cent upon brandy and spirits would be far below the revenue standard, would greatly diminish the income on these imports, require increased burdens upon the necessaries of life, and would revolt the moral sense of the whole community. There are many other luxuries which will bear a much higher duty for revenue than 20 per cent, and the only true maximum is that which experience demonstrates will bring in each case the largest revenue at the lowest rate of duty. Nor should maximum revenue duties be imposed upon all articles, for this would yield too large an income and would prevent all discrimination within the revenue standard and require necessaries to be taxed as high as luxuries. But, whilst it is impossible to adopt any horizontal scale of duties, or even any arbitrary maximum, experience proves that, as a general rule, a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem will yield the largest revenue. There are, however, a few exceptions above as well as many below this standard. Thus, whilst the lowest revenue duty on most luxuries exceeds 20 per cent, there are many costly articles of small bulk, easily smuggled, which would bring, perhaps, no revenue at a duty as high as 20 per cent; and even at the present rate of 7½ per cent they yield, in most cases, a small revenue; whilst coal, iron, sugar, and molasses—articles of great bulk and weight—yielded last year six millions of revenue, at an average rate of duty exceeding 60 per cent ad valorem. These duties are far too high for revenue upon all these articles and ought to be reduced to the revenue standard; but if Congress desire to obtain the largest revenue from duties on these articles, those duties, at the lowest rate for revenue, would exceed 20 per cent ad valorem.

There are appended to this report tables, prepared with great care and labor, showing the rates of duty each year on each of these four articles and the equivalent ad valorem from the organization of the Government down to the present period, with the revenue collected every year upon each, from which tables Congress will be enabled to judge how far the present rates exceed the lowest revenue duties, and how much they must be reduced so as to yield a revenue equal to that now obtained from these articles.

[1] The sum of $121,050 of debt assumed for the cities in the District of Columbia, the sum of $1,000,000 for supplying deficiency in the revenues from postage, and $350,000 for postages for Congress and executive departments are included in the foregoing sum of $5,925,292.62.

It is believed that sufficient means can be obtained at the lowest revenue duties on the articles now subjected to duty; but if Congress desire a larger revenue, it should be procured by taxing the free articles rather than transcend, in any case, the lowest revenue duties. It is thought, however, that, without exceeding that limit in any case, an adequate revenue will still be produced and permit the addition to the free list of salt and guano. In one of his annual messages Mr. Jefferson recommended to Congress "the suppression of the duties on salt." A large portion of this duty is exhausted in heavy expenses of measuring salt and in large sums paid for fishing bounties and allowances in lieu of the drawback of the duty, both which expenditures would fall with a repeal of the duty; which repeal, therefore, can cause no considerable reduction of the revenue. Salt is a necessary of life and should be as free from tax as air or water. It is used in large quantities by the farmer and planter, and to the poor this tax operates most oppressively, not only in the use of the article itself, but as combined with salted provisions. The salt made abroad by solar evaporation is also most pure and wholesome and as conservative of health should be exempt from taxation.

The duty on cotton bagging is equivalent to 55.20 per cent ad valorem on the Scotch bagging and to 123.11 per cent on the gunny bag, and yet the whole revenue from these duties has fallen to $66,064.50. Nearly the entire amount, therefore, of this enormous tax makes no addition to the revenue, but inures to the benefit of about 30 manufacturers. As five-sixths of the cotton crop is exported abroad, the same proportion of the bagging around the bale is exported and sold abroad at a heavy loss, growing out of a deduction for tare. Now, as duties are designed to operate only on the domestic consumption, there ought to be a drawback of the whole duty on cotton bagging reexported around the bale, on the same principles on which drawbacks are allowed in other cases. The cotton planting is the great exporting interest and suffers from the tariff in the double capacity of consumer and exporter. Cotton is the great basis of our foreign exchange, furnishing most of the means to purchase imports and supply the revenue. It is thus the source of two-thirds of the revenue and of our foreign freight and commerce, upholding our commercial marine and maritime power. It is also a bond of peace with foreign nations, constituting a stronger preventive of war than armies or navies, forts or armaments. At present prices our cotton crop will yield an annual product of $72,000,000 and the manufactured fabric $504,000,000, furnishing profits abroad to thousands of capitalists and wages to hundreds of thousands of the working classes, all of whom would be deeply injured by any disturbance, growing out of a state of war, to the direct and adequate supply of the raw material. If our manufacturers consume 400,000 bales, it would cost them $12,000,000 whilst selling the manufactured fabric for $84,000,000, and they should be the last to unite in imposing heavy taxes upon that great interest which supplies them with the raw material out of which they realize such large profits. Accompanying the drawback of the duty on cotton bagging should be the repeal of the duty on foreign cotton, which is inoperative and delusive and not desired by the domestic producer.

The condition of our foreign relations, it is said, should suspend the reduction of the tariff. No American patriot can desire to arrest our onward career in peace and prosperity; but if, unhappily, such should be the result, it would create an increased necessity for reducing our present high duties in order to obtain sufficient revenue to meet increased expenditures. The duties for the quarter ending the 30th of September, 1844, yielded $2,011,885.90 more of revenue than the quarter ending 30th September, 1845, showing a very considerable decline of the revenue, growing out of a diminished importation of the highly protected articles and the progressive substitution of the domestic rivals. Indeed many of the duties are becoming dead letters, except for the purpose of prohibition, and, if not reduced, will ultimately compel their advocates to resort to direct taxation to support the Government. In the event of war nearly all the high duties would become prohibitory, from the increased risk and cost of importations; and if there be, indeed, in the opinion of any, a serious danger of such an occurrence, it appeals most strongly to their patriotism to impose the lowest revenue duties on all articles as the only means of securing at such a period any considerable income from the tariff.

The whole power to collect taxes, whether direct or indirect, is conferred by the same clause of the Constitution. The words are, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." A direct tax or excise, not for revenue but for protection, clearly would not be within the legitimate object of taxation, and yet it would be as much so as a duty imposed for a similar purpose. The power is "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." A duty must be laid only that it may be collected, and if it is so imposed that it can not be collected, in whole or in part, it violates the declared object of the granted power. To lay all duties so high that none of them could be collected would be a prohibitory tariff. To lay a duty on any one article so high that it could not be collected would be a prohibitory tariff upon that article. If a duty of 100 per cent were imposed upon all or upon a number of articles, so as to diminish the revenue upon all or any of them, it would operate as a partial prohibition. A partial and a total prohibition are alike in violation of the true object of the taxing power. They only differ in degree and not in principle. If the revenue limit may be exceeded 1 per cent, it may be exceeded 100. If it may be exceeded upon any one article, it may be exceeded on all; and there is no escape from this conclusion, but in contending that Congress may lay duties on all articles so high as to collect no revenue and operate as a total prohibition.

The Constitution declares that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." A tariff bill, it is conceded, can only originate in the House, because it is a bill for raising revenue. That is the only proper object of such a bill. A tariff is a bill to "lay and collect taxes." It is a bill for "raising revenue," and whenever it departs from that object, in whole or in part, either by total or partial prohibition, it violates the purpose of the granted power.

In arranging the details of the tariff, it is believed that the maximum revenue duties should be imposed upon luxuries. It is deemed just that taxation, whether direct or indirect, should be as nearly as practicable in proportion to property. If the whole revenue were raised by a tax upon property, the poor, and especially those who live by the wages of labor, would pay but a very small portion of such tax; whereas by the tariff the poor, by the consumption of various imports or domestic articles enhanced in price by the duties, pay a much larger share of the taxes than if they were collected by an assessment in proportion to property. To counteract as far as possible this effect of the tariff—to equalize its operation and make it approximate as nearly as may be to a system of taxes in proportion to property—the duties upon luxuries, used almost exclusively by the rich, should be fixed at the highest revenue standard. This would not be discriminating in favor of the poor, however just that might be within the revenue limit; but it would mitigate, as far as practicable, that discrimination against the poor which results from every tariff by compelling them to pay a larger amount of taxes than if assessed and collected on all property in proportion to its value. In accordance with these principles, it is believed that the largest practicable portion of the aggregate revenue should be raised by maximum revenue duties upon luxuries, whether grown, produced, or manufactured at home or abroad.

An appeal has been made to the poor by the friends of protection on the ground that it augments the wages of labor. In reply it is contended that the wages of labor have not augmented since the tariff of 1842, and that in some cases they have diminished.

When the number of manufactories is not great the power of the system to regulate the wages of labor is inconsiderable; but as the profit of capital invested in manufactures is augmented by the protective tariff there is a corresponding increase of power until the control of such capital over the wages of labor becomes irresistible. As this power is exercised from time to time we find it resisted by combinations among the working classes, by turning out for higher wages or for shorter time, by trades-unions, and in some countries, unfortunately, by violence and bloodshed. But the Government, by protective duties, arrays itself on the side of the manufacturing system, and by thus augmenting its wealth and power soon terminates in its favor the struggle between man and money—between capital and labor. When the tariff of 1842 was enacted the maximum duty was 20 per cent. By that act the average of duties on the protected articles was more than doubled. But the wages of labor did not increase in a corresponding ratio, or in any ratio whatever. On the contrary, whilst wages in some cases have diminished the prices of many articles used by the working classes have greatly appreciated.

A protective tariff is a question regarding the enhancement of the profits of capital. That is its object and not to augment the wages of labor, which would reduce those profits. It is a question of percentage and is to decide whether money invested in our manufactures shall, by special legislation, yield a profit of 10, 20, or 30 per cent, or whether it shall remain satisfied with a dividend equal to that accruing from the same capital invested in agriculture, commerce, or navigation.

The present tariff is unjust and unequal, as well in its details as in the principles upon which it is founded. On some articles the duties are entirely prohibitory and on others there is a partial prohibition. It discriminates in favor of manufacturers and against agriculture by imposing many higher duties upon the manufactured fabric than upon the agricultural product out of which it is made. It discriminates in favor of the manufacturer and against the mechanic by many higher duties upon the manufacture than upon the article made out of it by the mechanic. It discriminates in favor of the manufacturer and against the merchant by injurious restrictions upon trade and commerce, and against the shipbuilding and navigating interest by heavy duties on almost every article used in building or navigating vessels. It discriminates in favor of manufactures and against exports, which are as truly the product of American industry as manufactures. It discriminates in favor of the rich and against the poor by high duties upon nearly all the necessaries of life and by minimums and specific duties, rendering the tax upon the real value much higher on the cheaper than upon the finer article.

Minimums are a fictitious value assumed by law instead of the real value, and the operation of all minimums may be illustrated by a single example. Thus, by the tariff of 1842, a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem is levied on all manufactures of cotton, but the law further provides that cotton goods "not dyed, colored, printed, or stained, not exceeding in value 20 cents per square yard, shall be valued at 20 cents per square yard." If, then, the real value of the cheapest cotton goods is but 4 cents a square yard, it is placed by the law at the false value of 20 cents per square yard, and the duty levied on the fictitious value—raising it five times higher on the cheap article consumed by the poor than upon the fine article purchased by the more wealthy. Indeed, by House Document No. 306, of the first session of the Twenty-eighth Congress, this difference, by actual importation, was 65 per cent between the cheaper and the finer article of the 20 per cent minimum, 131 per cent on the 30 per cent minimum, 48½ per cent on the 35 per cent minimum, 84 per cent on the 60 per cent minimum, and 84 per cent on the 75 per cent minimum. This difference is founded on actual importation and shows an average discrimination against the poor on cotton imports of 82 per cent beyond what the tax would be if assessed upon the actual value. The operation of the specific duty presents a similar discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich. Thus, upon salt: The duty is not upon the value, but it is 8 cents a bushel, whether the article be coarse or fine—showing, by the same document, from actual importation, a discrimination of 64 per cent against the cheap and in favor of the finer article; and this, to a greater or less extent, is the effect of all specific duties. When we consider that $2,892,621.74 of the revenue last year was collected by minimum duties and $13,311,085.46 by specific duties, the discrimination against the cheaper article must amount, by estimates founded on the same document, to a tax of $5,108,422 exacted by minimums and specific duties annually from the poorer classes, by raising thus the duties on the cheaper articles above what they would be if the duty were assessed upon the actual value. If direct taxes were made specific, they would be intolerable. Thus, if an annual tax of $30 was assessed on all houses, without respect to their actual value, making the owner of the humble tenement or cabin pay a tax of $30 and the owner of the costly mansion a tax of but $30 on their respective houses, it would differ only in degree but not in principle from the same unvarying specific duty on cheap as on fine articles. If any discrimination should be made, it should be the reverse of the specific duty and of the minimum principle, by establishing a maximum standard, above which value the duties on the finer article should be higher and below which they should be lower on the cheaper article. The tax upon the actual value is the most equal and can only be accomplished by ad valorem duties. As to fraudulent invoices and undervaluations, these dangers are believed to be arrested effectually by the stringent provisions and severe penalty of the seventeenth section of the tariff of 1842, and now one-half the revenue is collected from ad valorem duties.

At least two-thirds of the taxes imposed by the present tariff are paid, not into the Treasury, but to the protected classes. The revenue from imports last year exceeded $27,000,000. This, in itself, is a heavy tax; but the whole tax imposed upon the people by the present tariff is not less than $81,000,000—of which $27,000,000 are paid to the Government upon the imports and $54,000,000 to the protected classes in enhanced prices of similar domestic articles.

This estimate is based upon the position that the duty is added to the price of the import and also of its domestic rival. If the import is enhanced in price by the duty, so must be the domestic rival; for, being like articles, their price must be the same in the same market. The merchant advances in cash the duty on the import and adds the duty, with a profit upon it and other charges, to the price—which must therefore be enhanced to that extent unless the foreign producer had first deducted the duty from the price. But this is impossible, for such now is and long has been the superabundance of capital and active competition in Europe that a profit of 6 per cent in any business is sufficient to produce large investments of money in that business; and if, by our tariff, a duty of 40 per cent be exacted on the products of such business, and the foreign producer deducts that duty from his previous price, he must sustain a heavy loss. This loss would also soon extend beyond the sales for our consumption to sales to our merchants of articles to be reexported by them from our ports with a drawback of the duty, which would bring down their price throughout the markets of the world. But this the foreign producer can not afford. The duty therefore must be added to the price and paid by the consumer—the duty constituting as much a part of the price as the cost of production.

If it be true that when a duty of 40 per cent is imposed by our tariff, the foreign producer first deducts the duty from the previous price on the sale to our merchant, it must be equally true with a duty of 100 per cent, which is exactly equal to the previous price, and, when deducted, would reduce the price to nothing.

The occasional fall in price of some articles after a tariff is no proof that this was the effect of the tariff, because, from improved machinery, diminished prices of the raw material, or other causes, prices may fall even after a tariff, but they would in such cases have fallen much more but for the tariff. The truest comparison is between the present price of the same article at home and abroad, and to the extent that the price is lower in the foreign market than in our own, the duty, if equal to that difference, must to that extent enhance the price and in the same ratio with the lower duty. The difference in price at home or abroad is generally about equal to the difference in the cost of production, and presents, in a series of years, the surest measure of the effect of the duty—the enhancement in price being equal to that difference if the duty be higher than that difference or equal to it; or if the duty be lower, then the enhancement is equal to the duty; and if the article is produced, like cotton, more cheaply here than abroad, the duty is inoperative. The great argument for the tariff is that foreign labor being cheaper than our own the cost of foreign productions, it is said, is lessened to that extent, and that we must make up this difference by an equivalent duty and a corresponding enhancement of price in our own market both of the foreign article and of its rival domestic product, thus rendering the duty a tax on all consumers for the benefit of the protected classes. If the marshal were sent by the Federal Government to collect a direct tax from the whole people, to be paid over to manufacturing capitalists to enable them to sustain their business or realize a larger profit, it would be the same in effect as the protective duty, which, when analyzed in its simplest elements and reduced to actual results, is a mere subtraction of so much money from the people to increase the resources of the protected classes. Legislation for classes is against the doctrine of equal rights, repugnant to the spirit of our free institutions, and, it is apprehended by many, may become but another form for privileged orders, under the name of protection, instead of privilege—indicated here not by rank or title, but by profits and dividends extracted from the many, by taxes upon them, for the benefit of the few.

No prejudice is felt by the Secretary of the Treasury against manufacturers. His opposition is to the protective system and not to classes or individuals. He doubts not that the manufacturers are sincerely persuaded that the system which is a source of so much profit to them is beneficial also to the country. He entertains a contrary opinion and claims for the opponents of the system a settled conviction of its injurious effects. Whilst a due regard to the just and equal rights of all classes forbids a discrimination in favor of the manufacturers by duties above the lowest revenue limit, no disposition is felt to discriminate against them by reducing such duties as operate in their favor below that standard. Under revenue duties it is believed they would still receive a reasonable profit—equal to that realized by those engaged in other pursuits—and it is thought they should desire no more, at least through the agency of governmental power. Equal rights and profits, so far as laws are made, best conform to the principles upon which the Constitution was founded, and with an undeviating regard to which all its functions should be exercised—looking to the whole country and not to classes or sections.

Soil, climate, and other causes vary very much in different countries the pursuits which are most profitable in each; and the prosperity of all of them will be best promoted by leaving them unrestricted by legislation to exchange with each other those fabrics and products which they severally raise most cheaply. This is clearly illustrated by the perfect free trade which exists among all the States of the Union and by the acknowledged fact that any one of these States would be injured by imposing duties upon the products of the others. It is generally conceded that reciprocal free trade among nations would best advance the interests of all. But it is contended that we must meet the tariffs of other nations by countervailing restrictions. That duties upon our exports by foreign nations are prejudicial to us is conceded, but whilst this injury is slightly felt by the manufacturer, its weight falls almost exclusively upon agriculture, commerce, and navigation. If those interests which sustain the loss do not ask countervailing restrictions, it should not be demanded by the manufacturers, who do not feel the injury, and whose fabrics, in fact, are not excluded by the foreign legislation of which they complain. That agriculture, commerce, and navigation are injured by foreign restrictions constitutes no reason why they should be subject to still severer treatment, by additional restrictions and countervailing tariffs enacted at home.

Commerce, agriculture, and navigation, harassed as they may be by foreign restrictions, diminishing the amount of exchangeable products which they could otherwise purchase abroad, are burdened with heavier impositions at home. Nor will augmented duties here lead to a reduction of foreign tariffs; but the reverse, by furnishing the protected classes there with the identical argument used by the protected classes here against reduction. By countervailing restrictions we injure our own fellow-citizens much more than the foreign nations at whom we propose to aim their force, and in the conflict of opposing tariffs we sacrifice our own commerce, agriculture, and navigation. As well might we impose monarchical or aristocratic restrictions on our own Government or people because that is the course of foreign legislation. Let our commerce be as free as our political institutions. Let us, with revenue duties only, open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will soon follow our example. If we reduce our tariff, the party opposed to the corn laws of England would soon prevail and admit all our agricultural products at all times freely into her ports in exchange for her exports. And if England would now repeal her duties upon our wheat, flour, Indian corn, and other agricultural products, our own restrictive system would certainly be doomed to overthrow. If the question is asked, Who shall begin this work of reciprocal reduction? it is answered by the fact that England has already abated her duties upon most of our exports. She has repealed the duty upon cotton and greatly reduced the tariff upon our breadstuffs, provisions, and other articles, and her present bad harvest, if accompanied by a reduction of our tariff, would lead to the repeal of her corn laws and the unrestricted admission at all times of our agricultural products. The manufacturing interest opposes reciprocal free trade with foreign nations. It opposes the Zoll-Verein treaty, and it is feared that no other treaty producing a reciprocal reduction of our own and foreign tariffs will receive its support. If that interest preferred a reciprocal exchange of our own for foreign fabrics at revenue duties, it would not have desired a tariff operating, without exception, against all nations that adopted low as well as high tariffs; nor would it have opposed every amendment proposing, when the tariff of 1842 was under consideration, a reduction of our duties upon the exports of such nations as would receive, free of duty, our flour and other agricultural products.

If that interest desired reciprocal free trade with other nations, it would have desired a very different tariff from that of 1842. It would have sought to confine the high duties to those cases where the foreign importer would sell his imports for cash only, and admitted a drawback of one-half of the duty where American exports would be taken abroad in exchange—not an actual barter of foreign imports for an equal amount in value of our products, but without any barter, where a sum equal to the value of their exports was used in purchasing here an equal amount in value of any of our products; and the shipment made abroad of these products upon the same principle under which a drawback of duties is now allowed on the reexportation of foreign imports. This would be less simple and is not recommended in lieu of that absolute reduction of the duties which will accomplish the same object of unrestricted exchange. But such a provision would be a self-executing reciprocity law and should be desired by those believing in countervailing tariffs against foreign nations, but in reciprocal free trade with all—thus enabling our farmers and planters to sell their products for cheaper foreign manufactures, getting more for what they sell and paying less for what they purchase in exchange. It seems strange that while the profit of agriculture varies from 1 to 8 per cent, that of manufactures is more than double. The reason is that whilst the high duties secure nearly a monopoly of the home market to the manufacturer, the farmer and planter are deprived to a great extent of the foreign market by these duties. The farmer and planter are to a great extent forbidden to buy in the foreign market and confined to the domestic articles enhanced in price by the duties. The tariff is thus a double benefit to the manufacturer and a double loss to the farmer and planter—a benefit to the former in nearly a monopoly of the home market and in enhanced prices of their fabrics, and a loss to the latter in the payment of those high prices and a total or partial exclusion from the foreign market. The true question is whether the farmer and planter shall to a great extent supply our people with cheap manufactures, purchased abroad with their agricultural products, or whether this exchange shall be forbidden by high duties on such manufactures and their supply thrown, as a monopoly, at large prices by high tariffs into the hands of our own manufacturers. The number of manufacturing capitalists who derive the benefit from the heavy taxes extracted by the tariff from 20,000,000 of people does not exceed 10,000. The whole number (including the working classes engaged in our manufactures) deriving any benefit from the tariff does not exceed 400,000, of whom not more than 40,000 have been brought into this pursuit by the last tariff. But this small number of 40,000 would still have been in the country, consuming our agricultural products, and in the attempt to secure them as purchasers, so small in number and not consuming one-half the supply of many counties, the farmer and planter are asked to sacrifice the markets of the world, containing a population of 800,000,000, disabled from purchasing our products by our high duties on all they would sell in exchange. The farmer and planter have the home market without a tariff, and they would have the foreign market also to a much greater extent but for the total or partial prohibition of the last tariff.

We have more fertile lands than any other nation, can raise a greater variety of products, and, it may be said, could feed and clothe the people of nearly all the world. The home market of itself is wholly inadequate for such products. They must have the foreign market, or a large surplus, accompanied by great depression in price, must be the result. The States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, if cultivated to their fullest extent, could of themselves raise more than sufficient food to supply the entire home market. Missouri or Kentucky could more than supply it with hemp; already the State of Mississippi raises more cotton than is sufficient for all the home market; Louisiana is rapidly approaching the same point as to sugar; and there are lands enough adapted to that product in Louisiana, Texas, and Florida to supply with sugar and molasses nearly all the markets of the world. If cotton is depressed in price by the tariff, the consequence must be a comparative diminution of the product and the raising in its place to a great extent hemp, wheat, corn, stock, and provisions, which otherwise would be supplied by the teeming products of the West. The growing West in a series of years must be the greatest sufferers by the tariff, in depriving them of the foreign market and that of the cotton-growing States. We demand, in fact, for our agricultural products specie from nearly all the world, by heavy taxes upon all their manufactures; and their purchases from us must therefore be limited, as well as their sales to us enhanced in price. Such a demand for specie, which we know in advance can not be complied with, is nearly equivalent to a decree excluding most of our agricultural products from the foreign markets. Such is the rigor of our restrictions that nothing short of a famine opens freely the ports of Europe for our breadstuffs. Agriculture is our chief employment; it is best adapted to our situation; and, if not depressed by the tariff, would be the most profitable. We can raise a larger surplus of agricultural products and a greater variety than almost any other nation and at cheaper rates. Remove, then, from agriculture all our restrictions, and by its own unfettered power it will break down all foreign restrictions, and, ours being removed, would feed the hungry and clothe the poor of our fellow men throughout all the densely peopled nations of the world. But now we will take nothing in exchange for these products but specie, except at very high duties, and nothing but a famine breaks down all foreign restrictions and opens for a time the ports of Europe to our breadstuffs. If, on a reduction of our duties, England repeals her corn laws, nearly all Europe must follow her example or give to her manufacturers advantages which can not be successfully encountered in most of the markets of the world. The tariff did not raise the price of our breadstuffs, but a bad harvest in England does—giving us for the time that foreign market which we would soon have at all times by that repeal of the corn laws which must follow the reduction of our duties. But whilst breadstuffs rise with a bad harvest in England, cotton almost invariably falls; because the increased sum which, in that event, England must pay for our breadstuffs we will take, not in manufactures, but only in specie; and not having it to spare, she brings down, even to a greater extent, the price of our cotton. Hence the result that a bad harvest in England reduces the aggregate price of our exports, often turns the exchanges against us, carrying our specie abroad, and inflicting a serious blow on our prosperity. Foreign nations can not for a series of years import more than they export; and if we close our markets against their imports by high duties, they must buy less of our exports or give a lower price, or both.

Prior to the 30th of June, 1842, a credit was given for the payment of duties, since which date they have been collected in cash. Before the cash duties and the tariff of 1842 our trade in foreign imports reexported abroad afforded large and profitable employment to our merchants and freight to our commercial marine, both for the inward and outward voyage; but since the last tariff this trade is being lost to the country, as is proved by the tables hereto annexed. The total amount of foreign imports reexported during the three years since the last tariff, both of free and dutiable goods, is $33,384,394—being far less than in any three years (except during the war) since 1793, and less than was reexported in any one of eight several years. The highest aggregate of any three years was $173,108,813 and the lowest aggregate $41,315,705—being in the years 1794, 1795, and 1796. Before 1820 the free goods are not distinguished in this particular from the dutiable goods, but since that date the returns show the following result: During the three years since the tariff of 1842 the value of dutiable imports reexported was $12,590,811—being less than in any one of seven years preceding since 1820—the lowest aggregate of any three years since that date being $14,918,444 and the highest $57,727,293. Even before the cash duties, for five years preceding the high tariff of 1828, the value of dutiable goods reexported was $94,796,241, and for the five years succeeding that tariff, $66,784,192, showing a loss of $28,012,049 of our trade in foreign exports after the tariff of 1828. The diminution of this most valuable branch of commerce has been the combined result of cash duties and of the high tariff of 1842. If the cash duties are retained, as it is believed they should be, the only sure method of restoring this trade is the adoption of the warehousing system, by which the foreign imports may be kept in store by the Government until they are required for reexportation abroad or consumption at home—in which latter contingency, and at the time when, for that purpose, they are taken out of these stores for consumption, the duties are paid, and, if reexported, they pay no duty, but only the expense of storage. Under the present system the merchant introduces foreign imports of the value of $100,000. He must now, besides the advance for the goods, make a further advance in cash, in many cases, of $50,000 for the duties. Under such a system but a small amount of goods will be imported for drawbacks, and the higher the duty the larger must be the advance and the smaller the imports for reexportation.

The imports, before payment of duties under the same regulations now applied to our imports in transit to Canada, may be taken from warehouse to warehouse—from the East to the Lakes, and to Pittsburg, Cincinnati, and Louisville; from New Orleans to Natchez, Vicksburg, Memphis, and St. Louis—and warehoused in these and other interior ports, the duties remaining unpaid until the goods are taken out of the warehouse and out of the original package at such ports for consumption, thus carrying our foreign commerce into the interior, with all the advantage of augmented business and cheaper supplies throughout the country. It will introduce into our large ports on or near the seaboard assorted cargoes of goods, to be reexported with our own, to supply the markets of the world. It will cheapen prices to the consumer by deducting the interest and profit that are now charged upon the advance of duty, building up the marts of our own commerce and giving profitable employment to our own commercial marine. It will greatly increase our revenue by augmenting our imports, together with our exports, and is respectfully recommended to Congress as an important part of the whole system now proposed for their consideration.

The act of the 3d of March last allowing a drawback on foreign imports exported from certain of our ports to Canada and also to Santa Fe and Chihuahua, in Mexico, has gone to some extent into effect under regulations prescribed by this department and is beginning to produce the most happy results, especially in an augmented trade in the supply of foreign exports to Canada from our own ports. Indeed, this law must soon give to us the whole of this valuable trade during the long period when the St. Lawrence is closed by ice, and a large proportion of it at all seasons. The result would be still more beneficial if Canada were allowed to carry all her exports to foreign nations in transitu through our own railroads, rivers, and canals, to be shipped from our own ports. Such a system, whilst it would secure to us this valuable trade, would greatly enlarge the business on our rivers, lakes, railroads, and canals, as well as augment our commerce; and would soon lead to the purchase by Canada not only of our foreign exports, but also, in many cases, of our domestic products and fabrics to complete an assortment. In this manner our commercial relations with Canada would become more intimate and more and more of her trade every year would be secured to our people.

Connected with this department and the finances is the question of the sales of the public lands. The proceeds of these sales, it is believed, should continue to constitute a portion of the revenue, diminishing to that extent the amount required to be raised by the tariff. The net proceeds of these sales paid into the Treasury during the last fiscal year was $2,077,022.30, and from the first sales in 1787 up to the 30th of September last was $118,607,335.91. The average annual sales have been much less than 2,000,000 of acres, yet the aggregate net proceeds of the sales in 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837 was $51,268,617.82. Those large sales were almost exclusively for speculation, and this can only be obviated at all times by confining the sales to settlers and cultivators in limited quantities, sufficient for farms or plantations. The price at which the public lands should be sold is an important question to the whole country, but especially to the people of the new States, living mostly remote from the seaboard, and who have scarcely felt the presence of the Government in local expenditures, but chiefly in the exhaustion of their means for purchases of public lands and for customs. The public lands are not of the same value, yet they are all fixed at one unvarying price, which is far above the value of a large portion of these lands. The quantity now subject to entry at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre is 133,307,457 acres and 109,035,345 in addition, to which the Indian title has been extinguished—being an aggregate of 242,342,802 acres, and requiring a century and a quarter to complete the sales at the rate they have progressed heretofore, without including any of the unsold lands of Texas or Oregon or of the vast region besides to which the Indian title is not yet extinguished. It is clear, then, that there is a vast and annually increasing surplus of public lands, very little of which will be sold within any reasonable period at the present price, and in regard to which the public interest would be promoted and the revenue augmented by reducing the price. The reduction of the price of the public lands in favor of settlers and cultivators would enhance the wages of labor. It is an argument urged in favor of the tariff that we ought to protect our labor against what is called the "pauper labor" of Europe. But whilst the tariff does not enhance the wages of labor, the sales of the public lands at low prices and in limited quantities to settlers and cultivators would accomplish this object.

If those who live by the wages of labor could purchase 320 acres of land for $80, 160 acres for $40, or 80 acres for $20, or 40-acre lot for $10, the power of the manufacturing capitalist in reducing the wages of labor would be greatly diminished; because when these lands were thus reduced in price those who live by the wages of labor could purchase farms at these low rates and cultivate the soil for themselves and families instead of working for others 12 hours a day in the manufactories. Reduce the price which the laborer must pay for the public domain; bring thus the means of purchase within his power; prevent all speculation and monopoly in the public lands; confine the sales to settlers and cultivators in limited quantities; preserve these hundreds of millions of acres for ages to come as homes for the poor and oppressed; reduce the taxes by reducing the tariff and bringing down the prices which the poor are thus compelled to pay for all the necessaries and comforts of life, and more will be done for the benefit of American labor than if millions were added to the profits of manufacturing capital by the enactment of a protective tariff.

The Secretary of the Treasury, on coming into office, found the revenues deposited with banks. The law establishing the Independent Treasury was repealed, and the Secretary had no power to reestablish that system. Congress had not only repealed that law, but, as a substitute, had adopted the present system of deposit banks and prohibited changing any one of those for another bank except for specified reasons. No alternative was left but to continue the existing system until Congress should think proper to change it. That change, it is hoped, will now be made by a return to the Treasury of the Constitution. One of the great evils of banks is the constant expansion and contraction of the currency, and this evil is augmented by the deposits of the revenue with banks, whether State or national. The only proper course for the Government is to keep its own money separate from all banks and bankers, in its own treasury—whether in the mint, branch mints, or other Government agencies—and to use only gold and silver coin in all receipts and disbursements. The business of the country will be more safe when an adequate supply of specie is kept within our limits and its circulation encouraged by all the means within the power of the Government. If this Government and the States and the people unite in suppressing the use of specie, an adequate supply, for want of a demand, can not be kept within our limits and the condition of the business and currency of the country will be perilous and uncertain. It will be completely within the power of the banks, whose paper will constitute the exclusive circulation of the whole community. Nor will it be useful to establish a constitutional treasury if it is to receive or disburse the paper of banks. Separation from banks in that case would only be nominal and no addition would be made to the circulation of gold and silver.

Various forms of paper credit have been suggested as connected with the operations of the constitutional treasury, but they are all considered as impairing one of the great objects of such a treasury—namely, an augmented circulation of specie. If paper, in whatever form or from whatever source it may issue, should be introduced as a circulation by the constitutional treasury, it would, precisely to that extent, diminish its use as a means of circulating gold and silver.

The constitutional treasury could be rendered a most powerful auxiliary of the mint in augmenting the specie circulation. The amount of public money which can be placed in the mint is now limited by law to $1,000,000, and to that extent it is now used as a depository and as a means of increasing our coinage. It is suggested that this limitation may be so modified as to permit the use of our mint and branch mints for a much larger sum, in connection with the constitutional treasury. The amount of public money received at New York greatly exceeds that collected at all other points, and would, of itself, seem to call for a place of public deposit there; in view of which the location of a branch of the mint of the United States at that city would be most convenient and useful. The argument used against a constitutional treasury, of the alleged insecurity of the public funds in the hands of individuals, and especially the vast amount collected at New York, will be entirely obviated by such an establishment. The mint of the United States has now been in existence 52 years. It has had the custody of upward of $114,000,000, and during this long period of time there never has been a loss of any of its specie in the mint by the Government. The mint at Philadelphia is now conducted with great efficiency by the able and faithful officer at the head of that establishment, whose general supervisory authority, without leaving the parent mint, might still be wisely extended to the branch at New York. Besides the utility of such a branch as a place for keeping safely and disbursing the public money, it is believed that the coinage might be greatly augmented by the existence of a branch of the mint at that great city. It is there that two-thirds of the revenue is annually collected—the whole of which, under the operation of the constitutional treasury, would be received in specie.

Of that amount a very large sum would be received in coin of other countries, and especially in foreign gold coins—all which could be speedily converted, upon the spot, into our own coins of gold and silver. The amount, also, of such foreign coin brought by emigrants to the city of New York is very considerable, a large portion of which would find its way to the branch of the mint for recoinage. The foreign gold coins do not, and it is feared will not, circulate generally as a currency, notwithstanding they are made a tender by law. The rate at which these coins are fixed by law is not familiar to the people; the denomination of such coin is inconvenient; the parts into which it is divided are not decimal; the rates at which it is taken vary in different parts of the Union. It is inconvenient in the way of ready transfer in counting; it is more difficult, in common use, to distinguish the genuine from the counterfeit foreign coin; and the stamp upon it is not familiar to the people—from all which causes a foreign gold coin does not and will not circulate generally as a currency among the people. In many of the banks nearly the whole of their specie is kept in every variety of foreign gold coin, and when it is tendered by them in payment of their notes, the great body of the people, not being familiar with these coins, do not receive them; and thus the circulation of a gold currency is, to a great extent, defeated. If these coins were converted at our mint or branch mints into the eagle, the half-eagle, and quarter-eagle we should speedily have a large supply of American gold coin, and it would very soon be brought into common use as a currency and thus give to it greater stability and greater security to all the business of the country. A considerable amount of foreign gold coin has, during the present year, under the directions of this department, been converted into American gold coin; but the process would be much more rapid if aided by the organization of the constitutional treasury and the establishment of a branch of the mint at the great commercial emporium of the Union. With the mint and branch mints as depositories, the sum remaining in the hands of other receivers of public money, whether of lands or customs, would be inconsiderable, and the Government could be readily protected from all losses of such sums by adequate bonds and the power by law to convict and punish as criminals all who embezzle the public moneys.

It is believed, under such a system, that no defaults would take place, and that the public moneys would be safely kept and disbursed in gold and silver. This Government is made, by the Constitution, the guardian of a specie currency. That currency can only be coined and its value regulated by this Government. It is one of its first duties to supply such a currency by an efficient mint and by general regulations of the coinage; but in vain will it attempt to perform that duty if, when coin is made or regulated in value, this Government dispenses with its use and expels it from circulation, or drives it out of the country by substituting the paper of banks in all the transactions of the Government.

There is nothing which will advance so surely the prosperity of the country as an adequate supply of specie, diffused throughout every portion of the Union and constituting to a great extent the ordinary circulation everywhere among the people. It is a currency that will never break nor fail; it will neither expand nor contract beyond the legitimate business of the country; it will lead to no extravagant speculations at one time, to be followed by certain depression at another; nor will labor ever be robbed of its reward by the depreciation of such currency. There is no danger that we shall have too much gold and silver in actual circulation, or too small an amount of bank paper, or that any injury ever will be inflicted upon the business of the country by a diminution of the circulation of the paper of banks and the substitution in its place to that extent of gold and silver. Even their most ardent advocates must admit that banks are subject to periodical expansions and contractions, and that this evil would be increased by giving them the funds of the Government to loan and by receiving and disbursing nothing but their paper.

It is believed that the permanent interest of every class of the people will be advanced by the establishment of the constitutional treasury, and that the manufacturers especially will derive great benefit from its adoption. It will give stability to all their operations and insure them to a great extent against those fluctuations, expansions, and contractions of the currency so prejudicial to their interests. By guarding against inflations of the currency it will have a tendency to check periodical excesses of foreign importations purchased in fact upon credit; while loans from banks, or dangerous enlargements of their business, and excessive issues of their paper will be greatly diminished. Whilst a sound and stable currency guards the manufacturer against excessive importations from abroad, it protects him from disasters at home and from those ruinous revulsions in which so many thousands are reduced to bankruptcy.

The tariff, if followed, as in the absence of adequate checks it certainly soon will be, by an inflated currency, whilst it thus enhances the expenses of manufacturing at home, will speedily and certainly raise prices up to the whole amount of the duty, so as to repeal the operation of that duty in favor of the manufacturer, and enable the foreign importer again to flood the market at the enhanced prices arising from an inflated currency. But soon the revulsion comes, and all are overwhelmed in a common ruin. The currency is reduced below the wants of the country by a sudden and ruinous contraction; and the labor and industry of years are required to repair the mischief. Stability, both in the tariff and the currency, is what the manufacturer should most desire. Let the tariff be permanently adjusted by a return to reasonable and moderate revenue duties which, even when imposed truly and in good faith for that purpose, will yield sufficient advantage to afford reasonable profits; and let this permanent system (and none other can be permanent) be established and accompanied by a stable currency, and the manufacturer, in a series of years, will derive the greatest benefits from the system. The present system can not be permanent. It is too unequal and unjust, too exorbitant and oppressive, and too clearly in conflict with the fundamental principles of the Constitution. If the manufacturer thinks that this system can be permanent, let him look to the constant changes which have attended all attempts to establish and continue a protective tariff. The first tariff was based in part upon the principle of very moderate protection to domestic manufactures, and the result has been, as appears by the table hereto annexed, that the tariff has been changed and modified 30 times since that period, being more than once, on an average, for every Congress since the Government was founded; and one of these tariffs was in itself a system of successive biennial changes, operating through a period of 10 years. Of these changes, 14 have been general and 16 special. From 1816 onward these changes have been most frequent, and it is vain to expect permanency from anything but a revenue tariff. Stability is what the manufacturer should desire, and especially that the question should be taken out of the arena of politics by a just and permanent settlement. A great number of tables, illustrative of the effects of the tariff, compiled from official documents, accompany this report. Some of these tables exhibit the operation of each of our tariffs from the organization of the Government to the present period. In order to enable the Secretary to comply with the direction of the acts of Congress, requiring him in his annual report to suggest "plans for improving or increasing the revenues" and to give "information to Congress in adopting modes of raising" the revenue, two circulars were issued, published, and generally distributed propounding various questions connected with this subject, and requesting replies. Some answers have been received from friends as well as opponents of the tariff, but the Secretary regrets that the manufacturers, with very few exceptions, have declined answering these questions or communicating any information as regards their profits and surplus or in relation to the wages of labor. An abstract of all that is deemed useful in these replies, together with a copy of both the circulars, is appended to this report.

The coast survey is rapidly progressing, having been extended eastward to the eastern coast of Massachusetts, and southward nearly to the dividing line of Maryland and Virginia on the Chesapeake. Two new centers of operation have been opened, under the sanction of this department, in North Carolina and on the Gulf of Mexico, from which the work may be spread until the parts unite. Important positions for forts, navy yards, harbors, and lighthouses present themselves along this interesting portion of the coast of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama and the islands guarding the interior channel between Mobile and New Orleans. Great economy exists in the administration of the fund appropriated for the coast survey, and every effort is made by the superintendent to press the work onward to a completion; and his report in detail will be hereafter submitted to Congress. Three charts, resulting from the survey, have been published within the past year, and five more are nearly ready for publication. This great work is most honorable to the science of our country, most useful to our Navy and commercial marine, and, in connection with our lighthouses, must decrease the cost of freight and insurance as well as the risk of life and property. Great attention has been given by this department to the very important subject of our lighthouse system. The various improvements suggested by experience at home or abroad, the relative advantages of gas or oil, of reflectors, lenticular and revolving lights, the location and construction of the buildings as well as the mode of keeping the lights, are all being fully and carefully investigated, and report, it is believed, will be ready during the present session of Congress. From the Chesapeake to the capes of Florida, and thence westward, our coast is badly lighted, as well as the Great Lakes of the Northwest; and numerous wrecks, often accompanied with loss of life and property, seem to require the interposition of Congress.

Such portions of the charts of the exploring expedition as were placed under the charge of this department were distributed for the benefit of our whale ships. These valuable charts embrace the survey of many hitherto almost unexplored regions and islands of the Pacific as well as a part of the coast of Oregon, and must be eminently useful for many purposes, but especially to our seamen and merchants engaged in the whale fishery. In pursuance of a resolution of Congress a report is in progress of preparation as regards the banks and currency, and also in relation to statistics; and these, with all other reports required from this department, will be presented at the earliest practicable period of the present session.

In presenting his annual report, in obedience to the law, the Secretary of the Treasury submits his views with undissembled diffidence, consoled by the reflection that all his errors of judgment will be corrected by the superior wisdom of the two Houses of Congress, guided and directed by that overruling Providence which has blessed the unexampled progress of this great and happy Union.

R. J. WALKER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN W. DAVIS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might dispose of the pending amendment, but I am informed that several Senators would prefer to have the matter go over until to-morrow morning, and therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY. That is perfectly satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 12, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 12, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. Smith, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. CANNON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Baptist Church of Glens Falls, N. Y., and a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Presbyterian Church of Crows Landing, Cal., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WORKS presented memorials of sundry citizens of West New Brighton, Staten Island, and New York City, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday-rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented a memorial of Moravian Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Hope, N. J., and a memorial of Local Grange No. 132, Patrons of Husbandry, of Cold Spring, N. J., remonstrating against the so-called reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Plainfield, N. J., praying for the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the New England Society of Orange, N. J., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of Local Division No. 10, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Hudson County; of Bismarck Lodge, No. 1, of Sayreville; of the Arion Club, of Sayreville; of the Schuetzen und Germania Society, of Sayreville; and of Martin Stanton, James Hamill, and P. D. Leary, of Jersey City, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MYERS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Fort Harrison, Helena, and Rimini, all in the State of Montana, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday-rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2877) amending section 67 of the act approved March 3, 1911, to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2925) providing for a Confederate naval monument in Vicksburg National Military Park, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 101) thereon.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION COMMISSION.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute Senate concurrent resolution No. 6, submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] June 29, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the hearings held before the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission be printed as a public document and that 3,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows.

By Mr. BURNHAM:

A bill (S. 3017) granting an increase of pension to Fayette W. Barlow; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GAMBLE:

A bill (S. 3018) granting an increase of pension to George H. Welshman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 3019) for the relief of Elizabeth McLaughlin; and

A bill (S. 3020) for the relief of E. M. Hundley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3021) granting an increase of pension to Stalnaker Marteney (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3022) granting a pension to Rosa Ohm (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FLORIDA EAST COAST RAILWAY CELEBRATION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 7) was read and referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions, as follows:

Whereas the citizens of the city of Key West, in the State of Florida, propose, by appropriate ceremonies, beginning on the 2d day of January, A. D. 1912, to celebrate the completion of the building of the extension of the main line of road of the Florida East Coast Railway Co. from the mainland of the State of Florida to the island city of Key West; and

Whereas the completion of this line of railway, covering more than 100 miles, along the chain of keys, connected by concrete viaducts, will mark the completion of the greatest enterprise in railroad engineering of this country and unequaled as an individual undertaking perhaps in the world; and

Whereas this great work is the result of the constructive ability of American genius, and has been made possible by the patriotic and progressive enterprise of its American promoters and builders; and

Whereas this marvelous accomplishment places the railways of the United States in close proximity to the Panama Canal and gives our country a commanding position with relation to the trade of all our neighboring Republics to the southward, thus making the enterprise one of both national and international importance, and its successful completion cause for congratulation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, earnestly requested to extend to all foreign nations an invitation to visit the city of Key West, Fla., and participate in the celebration of the completion of said over-sea railroad so connecting the mainland of the United States with the island city of Key West, both by their official representatives and citizens generally, and particularly to invite such foreign countries to send such of their respective naval vessels as may be practicable and convenient to participate in such celebration so to be held beginning on the 2d day of January, A. D. 1912.

Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to direct such portion of the Army of the United States as may be convenient and practicable to be present at Key West at the time of such proposed celebration and participate therein.

Resolved further, That under no circumstances is the United States to assume, be subjected to, or charged with, any expense of any character whatsoever in or about or connected with such proposed celebration.

ABOLITION OF SENATE OFFICES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a former day.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution No. 74, submitted by Mr. LODGE June 19, 1911, as follows:

Resolved, That the offices designated as "superintendent of the folding room," "assistant postmaster and mail carrier," "clerk, compiling a history of revenue and general appropriation bills," one unemployed messenger, and one unemployed laborer, be, and are hereby, abolished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In connection with the resolution just adopted, I ask if it has any relation to the colored man who was employed in the stationery room.

Mr. LODGE. It covers his case and one other.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the vote be reconsidered by which the resolution was adopted. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] desires to be present when it is considered.

Mr. LODGE. I put it over several times. It is a small matter, and I think it ought not to be put over again. It has been pending for three or four weeks.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It will not do any harm to let it go over until to-morrow. I am sure the Senator from Mississippi is interested in the matter. I do not know to what extent he is interested, but I know he wishes to be present when the resolution is considered, and I think that action ought to be postponed. It is of no great importance that it should be disposed of this morning.

Mr. LODGE. If it can be agreed that the resolution can be taken up and disposed of to-morrow morning, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hand it down again to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. If it is agreed that it shall be disposed of to-morrow morning, very well.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That course is entirely agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the action by which the resolution was passed is reconsidered, and the resolution will be handed down to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. The motion to reconsider goes over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I understood that the Senator from Virginia made a motion to reconsider.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the motion to reconsider leaves it with the status it had before. It is immaterial, so that there may be no final disposition before to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. I only desire to have it disposed of; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered, and the resolution will lie on the table.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. CULBERSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412, the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another matter for a moment. I should like to ask, if proper to do so, and I presume it is, whether the conference committee on House joint resolution 39 can advise me if there is likely to be a report from that committee soon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The chairman of the conference committee is not in the Senate Chamber at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. Two members of the committee are here. I presume they know something about it.

Mr. NELSON. There has been no meeting of the conferees yet. I inquired of the chairman of the Senate conference committee yesterday whether the House conferees had been here and desired to have a meeting, and he said he had not heard anything from them on the subject. That is all the information I have.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was of the opinion that there had not been any meeting of the conference committee, and I thought it proper to call attention to the fact that there ought to be an effort on the part of the conferees to get together. The Senate is entitled to know if the conferees can not agree, and it is entitled to have the result if the conferees can agree. We are approaching the time now when we are all hopeful of a final adjournment, and I feel quite sure that it will expedite the hour of adjournment if we can have a report from the conference committee.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to add a word further. My experience as a member of conference committees since I have been a Member of the Senate, and I think it is the experience of all Senate conferees, is that in all cases the House conferees come to the Senate conferees when they are ready to act; that it is not customary for the Senate conferees to go to the House, but the custom has been for the House conferees to indicate when they are ready to meet with the Senate conferees. I think I can safely say for the Senate conferees that we are ready at any time to meet whenever they are willing and indicate a disposition to meet. There has been no purpose, so far as I know, and I see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], a member of the conference committee, who, I think, will bear witness to the fact that there has been no disposition on the part of the Senate conferees to delay the matter in any shape or manner.

Mr. BORAH. I did not intend to intimate that there had been any intention to do so. I thought perhaps that owing to other pressing matters it had been overlooked, and I simply desired to call attention to it so that it might not be put aside too long.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has stated the facts as I understand them. I will add that I have had several conversations with the chairman of the House conferees and I judge from what he said to me that the disposition of the conferees on the part of the House is for an early meeting, and I have no doubt there will be one.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I just came into the Chamber and became cognizant of the matter under discussion. The only thing I can say as a member of the committee of conference is that in the regular order of business the papers are in the hands of the Senate conferees. The Senate committee is waiting the appearance or the action or the request of the House conferees to act thereon.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Georgia desires to speak, I yield to him.

Mr. BACON. I was going to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Brandegee	Gallinger	Myers	Sutherland
Bristow	Gamble	Nelson	Swanson
Brown	Gronna	Nixon	Thornton
Bryan	Guggenheim	Oliver	Townsend
Burnham	Heyburn	Overman	Warren
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Watson
Clapp	Jones	Penrose	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Perkins	Williams
Crane	Kern	Poindexter	Works
Cullom	Lodge	Pomerene
Cummins	McCumber	Reed
Curtis	McLean	Root

Mr. GAMBLE. My colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] is necessarily absent on important business out of the city.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I would ask if the pending amendment has been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been read. Without objection, it can be read again, if the Senator desires it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wanted to know whether it had been read. I have the amendment here. I should like to ask if the author of the amendment, the Senator from Texas, is present to explain the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that that Senator made a few desultory remarks in explanation of the amendment yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was trying to ascertain if he had made any remarks concerning the amendment. I listened very attentively to a most interesting argument between the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Mississippi upon general Democratic history and their elucidation of what constitutes a good Democrat.

I learned considerable about a gentleman by the name of Robert J. Walker, who seemed to have been the greatest philosopher as well as the greatest Democrat in the country, and who both Senators agreed was the greatest prevaricator we ever had in the country. But I got no information from either of the Senators concerning these amendments; there are several of them; and I wish the Senator from Texas was present——

Mr. BAILEY. I am.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that he would be able to explain, since we are now coming to a vote, some of their provisions.

Mr. President, if I understand the purpose of the pending amendment, it assumes that by the reciprocity agreement the farmers of this country have suffered great injury, and following upon the heels of this bill, which strikes them a most vicious blow, the Senator from Texas proposes this balm for their wounds. I want to find out from the Senator from Texas himself what benefit the farmer is to get out of what the Senator calls the farmers' free-list bill.

Mr. President, I can with mathematical accuracy determine just what injury this bill will be to the people of the entire Northwest. I can establish that so certainly that no Senator in this Chamber can gainsay the truth of the statement of the annual loss that will be suffered by the farmers of the State that I represent, of the State of South Dakota, and of the State of Minnesota. If we are to have some balm, some compensation for this injury, I want to know what it is.

Mr. President, but a few days ago we had a message from the President of the United States calling attention to the serious offense of fraudulently advertising nostrums as cures for certain ailments; and following the representation of the President of the United States I introduced a bill, hoping that it might be enacted into law, which would prevent any druggist or any so-called physician from advertising a nostrum which had no physiological effect on earth as a cure for some particular disease. I desire to make that act a criminal offense, and yet, while we would punish the fake doctor for prescribing something as a remedy which he knows will not be a remedy, we seem to gloss over an attempt to impose a fake remedy upon the farmers for the injury which is inflicted upon them by this bill.

I have diagnosed the case so far as this bill affects the people of the great Northwest. I know that we have a shortage of the kind of grain we need in our section of the country of a sufficient amount to make our tariffs on our present grain worth from 10 to 15 cents a bushel to us. I know that they raise in Canada, across the line, enough grain to make up that shortage, and in addition to have an enormous amount for export.

I know and have demonstrated that the result of this bill will be that both sections will then be placed on an export basis; that to-day our section, which is the great Northwest wheat-raising section, is not on an export basis and has not been on such a basis for a number of years; that the moment that it is placed on an export basis the market must necessarily go down from 10 to 15 cents a bushel on wheat; and that the moment we allow the Canadian crop to enter our land freely the market price of American wheat must go down to the level of the Canadian price.

Minnesota and the two Dakotas raise under normal conditions 250,000,000 bushels of wheat. Estimating the difference at only 10 cents a bushel, though the difference in price has averaged from 12 to 13 cents a bushel for the last few years, there is a loss of $25,000,000 to the farmers of those three States for a single year on wheat alone.

The Northwestern States also raise about 100,000,000 bushels of barley. The difference between the Canadian price and the American price last year averaged the full amount of the tariff duty, or about 30 cents per bushel. Figuring that, however, at only 25 cents a bushel, to be conservative, and we have another loss of $25,000,000 annually upon our barley crop.

Now, I want to make these matters clear; I want to make my diagnosis of the case certain; and then I should like to see whether or not the remedy which is proposed by the Senator from Texas will in fact be a remedy.

I then come to the flax crop, practically all of which is raised in the three States of North and South Dakota and Minnesota. My State raises about half of that crop, and the other half is divided between the other two States. We will place that conservatively at 15,000,000 bushels. I will ask my colleague if that is about right?

Mr. GRONNA. It is.

Mr. McCUMBER. About 15,000,000 bushels for those three States. The difference between the American and Canadian price during the last year and for about two years has been a difference of about 25 cents a bushel—nearly the exact amount of the tariff duty. That would make a loss of, we will say, $4,000,000 more. Thus I have shown a loss in those three States annually by reason of taking away the protection on our farmers' products of $56,000,000. I want to know, Mr. President, how we are to be compensated for this loss. I want the Senator who proposes this amendment to be as accurate in determining the extent of his remedy as I am accurate in determining the extent of our loss, so that we may estimate the amount of remedy or remedial salve that we are to get out of this farmers' free-list bill. If you rob one farmer of $100 in a single year, I want to know what he is to get back out of any one of those articles. It will not do to say to him that it is a little matter of principle; that he at least is given opportunity to buy in a free-trade market, unless you can point out to him what that free-trade market is.

I want my Democratic friends, including the Senator from Texas, and my Republican friends on this side, to comprehend the fact, which they do not seem to comprehend very well, that the farmer of the Northwest who has intelligence enough to know that he is hurt has also intelligence enough to understand that he gets no remedy whatever from this free-list bill. You give him, you say, free farm implements. Well, where is he to get those free farm implements from? Does not every farmer understand to-day, if he understands anything about the question, that he already has free trade in farm implements, except from those countries that levy a tariff upon American farm implements?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is the Senator from North Dakota oblivious to the fact that this amendment would put leather goods, boots, shoes, and lumber on the free list? Is that of no value to the farmer?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to figure out the value of that right now. Let me show my friend from Minnesota just what that value is. There is a reduction of $1.25 a thousand feet upon lumber. A farmer builds a house once in 45 years out of frame material. If he builds an ordinary, good-sized house he would probably purchase 20,000 feet of lumber. Twenty thousand feet of lumber at $1.25 a thousand would be $25. The farmer will have saved because of the free-list bill $25 in 45 years, or 55 cents a year, enough to buy five stogies. He is getting a great deal of benefit out of that, is he not?

Let us measure that against what he loses. I will take as a basis the farmer from the State of Minnesota who raises 100 acres of barley. He will raise on 100 acres, at a very low estimate, 2,000 bushels of barley, will he not? Two thousand bushels at a reduction in price of 30 cents a bushel would be about $600. He will lose at that rate $600 every year, and he will gain 55 cents—$600 on one side of the ledger and 55 cents on the other side of the ledger. Will any Senator tell me that that is compensation?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. If he gets 55 cents, the equity does not seem to be very strong in his favor; but the farmer will not get the 55 cents. It has been demonstrated since we passed the Payne-Aldrich bill that the Canadian lumber dealer takes up the amount of the reduction of the tariff immediately upon its going into effect. While we were passing the Payne-Aldrich bill two years ago the Canadian lumber dealer incorporated into his contracts the proposition that he was to have the benefit of the amount of the duty added to his price. While it was disputed during the debate that that would be general, since that time it has been demonstrated that it has been universal. The consumer of lumber has not received the color of a cent's benefit from the reduction of the duty on lumber two years ago. By the removal of the duty on lumber, on the other hand, we have been deprived of the revenue which we would have obtained, and which has gone directly into the hands of the Canadian lumber dealer. To put lumber upon the free list at this time is not, in my judgment, to reduce the price to the advantage of the builder at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have always contended, even though I am for free lumber and would vote for free lumber, that the granting of free lumber would make no difference in the price to the American consumer; that the only possibility of its affecting the price would be in the case where there possibly might be a combination here that would not take in the Canadian manufacturer. I support the proposition that that which the Lord Almighty put under the ground billions of years ago, and which can not be renewed by any process, but which when once used becomes forever exhausted, ought to be outside the pale of protection. That is the only reason why I have ever opposed a duty upon lumber. If I believed, as I know many Senators believe who claim that my fears are groundless, that the timber supply was not soon to be exhausted, I would be strongly in favor of a duty upon lumber.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I know of one lumber firm which shipped 8,000 carloads of lumber from the United States into Canada during the last year, and I am afraid that Canada is again getting the better of the diplomatic deal upon the question of conservation as well as upon the question of duty. If the Senator will permit me, I will read here a single paragraph from a letter from the governor of Vermont, written about the time the Payne-Aldrich bill was being considered, in which this process of taking up the duty was first brought to the attention of the public. The extract is as follows:

> You will understand this better when I tell you that only a week ago I traded a cut of 10,000,000 feet to be shipped during next year, but before I could close a trade I was obliged to put in the contract that if the duty was changed the seller should have one-half the reduction. Where would the consumer come in on this kind of a deal?

That was referred to at the time as an isolated transaction, but those who are interested in knowing what the effect was will find that that practice became universal in such transactions, and that the reason why the reduction was not of benefit to the consumer was because it was taken up by the Canadian lumber dealer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not intend to go into the question of the general policy of a duty on lumber; and I want to assure the Senator from Minnesota that, while he may consider that because I claim there is no financial benefit to be obtained from this measure, I would necessarily be opposed to it, on the contrary, there is something of a principle involved in it which will induce me, if I have an opportunity, to vote for it. But I am not going to vote for it and deceive the farming public into the idea that they will get a financial benefit out of this free-list bill.

I am sorry the Senator from Texas did not remain to answer a few of the questions I have propounded, for I understand this is a Democratic measure, and that the Democrats, as a rule, will vote for the free list in a separate bill to compensate the farmer for the loss that he will suffer. Some of them think he will not suffer any loss; but, assuming that he will suffer some loss, they believe the so-called free-list bill will partially compensate him for that loss.

I now take up the first provision, namely, agricultural machinery. That machinery consists of wagons, of plows, of harrows, of seeders, of drills, of hay rakes, of thrashing machines, and so forth. I should like to ask anyone on either side of the Chamber to inform me what country outside of the United States is to furnish the farmer with a single one of those articles after you have taken off the duty, as you say you will take it off? It is practically off now, so far as I know, between nearly all of the countries, unless it be Canada. But will the Senator from Texas be kind enough to tell me where the farmer will get his wagon after we have passed this free-list bill, and he can include, if he desires, in the same statement what country will furnish him with the other articles I have mentioned. I want to take them one after another, and I know that I can rely pretty accurately upon any statement that will be given by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from North Dakota must not have been in his seat, or if in his seat his attention must have been diverted when I was addressing the Senate yesterday afternoon, because I very frankly admitted that this provision of the free list will result in no substantial benefit to the farmer.

But while I am on my feet I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, who now underrates the value of this free-lumber provision, that I remember in 1909 what a persistent and earnest advocate of free lumber he was.

Mr. McCUMBER. I must say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that the Senator was absent when I just now discussed that point and that position——

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; I was not. I heard the Senator's point about conservation. But the Senator has changed his mind about that, I think, since the debate of 1909.

Mr. McCUMBER. Hardly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is aware, of course, that the highest authority on conservation in this country takes a different view from the one he expresses, and the Senator from North Dakota, who knows very much about all these things——

Mr. McCUMBER. He does not——

Mr. BAILEY. Is also aware that a Canadian commission has in its report concurred in the view expressed by Mr. Pinchot as relating to their own forests and their conservation.

But whether that was right or wrong, and whether the Senator from North Dakota was right or wrong, he was earnest for free lumber then. The Canadian treaty gives him free lumber, which he is not willing to take with free wheat, free barley, free flax, and other things, and all I am trying to do or all the House of Representatives tried to do in this free list was to put planed lumber or manufactured lumber, we will call it, upon exactly the same basis as rough lumber.

I think myself that is right. I think if the man who does the roughest work, for which he receives the smallest wage, is to have no duty on the product of his labor, then I think the more highly skilled labor and the more improved machinery, commanding, as it always does, a higher wage and a higher price for its product, might consent to take the same treatment as its less fortunate brother engaged in a similar enterprise.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator agrees with me entirely upon the proposition that there ought not to be any distinction; that if we are to have free lumber, everything in the lumber line should be free. That is, if we are going to have free lumber at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I probably go further than the Senator. I would not only emancipate manufactured lumber in all of its forms from a duty, if I emancipated it in its crude form, but I would also emancipate everything necessary in the lumber business, from the ax which the woodman lays to the tree to the electric-light bulb which the saw mill man uses for night operations, including the bands and saws and the machinery of every kind.

In other words, if the Senator will permit me, if people are compelled to sell their products on a free-trade basis, I think they ought to be permitted to produce them on a free-trade basis. Does the Senator from North Dakota agree with me in that?

Mr. McCUMBER. Absolutely; but let us not abandon the purpose of the original query, which was to ascertain whether we would get what we might call a substantial benefit to compensate in any way for our losses, or whether it is a mere bagatelle, so small, so very minute that we can scarcely take it into consideration as compensatory relief.

Mr. BAILEY. I need only repeat what I said to the Senator a moment ago and what I said to the Senate yesterday afternoon. I do not regard this as anything like a compensation. I do not even regard it as important. But whatever it is worth I want to give it to the American farmer.

I will say further to the Senator from North Dakota that in my view it would not and will not be possible to compensate the farmer for having put everything he produces on the free list, even if you give him 50 per cent of what he buys on the free list. The only equivalent that you can give him for compelling him to sell all he produces in a free-trade market is to give him the right to purchase all he consumes in a free-trade market. In that way——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator would not call it an equivalent.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I think that is an equivalent. The Senator from North Dakota knows that my view is that if everybody in this country could buy on a free-trade basis, everybody in this country could produce and sell on a free-trade basis. If it were not for the necessity of raising revenue to support the Government I would be willing to convert the customhouses into schoolhouses. I have no doubt that with the superior intelligence, the superior skill of our people, supplemented by the superior natural advantages of our country, we could maintain an equal contest in our own markets and, I believe, in all the markets of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we would put on the free list everything that is imported into the United States we could not compensate the farmer in the Northwest for the loss he suffers under this bill. Now, let me give the Senator a little illustration.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will not think I am impolite, I must leave the Chamber to meet some young constituents who are waiting for me. As soon as I dispose of them I will return and renew the debate with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

The proposition is this: The farmer sells a dollar's worth of his produce which without a protection of 25 per cent duty would bring only a dollar. He sells that produce, because of the duty, for $1.25. He takes that $1.25 and goes into the market and purchases one dollar and a quarter's worth of goods at retail. Now, here is the difference, and Senators will comprehend it the moment that they look at it.

He buys upon a retail basis. He sells upon a wholesale basis. The tariff that is levied upon the things he purchases is not levied upon the retail price, but upon the manufacturers' price. If it was levied upon the retailers' price, then a 25 per cent ad valorem duty taken off of that retail price would balance an ad valorem duty of 25 cents taken off of his selling price. But it so happens that under our method of doing business the article advances so rapidly in value from the time it leaves the manufacturers' hands until it is turned over to the consumer, that every time it is touched by the golden hand of American labor you have added to its value sometimes two and three fold, that there is no relation whatever between the original price and the selling price to the consumer.

Then we take this same article that he buys at retail for a dollar and a quarter, and on the average you would find that the manufacturer's price was perhaps not over 20 cents. Then if you take away 25 per cent duty from the manufacturer's price you will have reduced it 5 cents. Therefore, the farmer would save in his purchases, provided he always pays the full amount of the tariff, 5 cents. He would lose 25 cents on a dollar on his sales. The result would be that he would lose five times as much as he gained. That is true in almost every line of purchases.

So, Mr. President, I say you can not fully compensate him. But the complaint I make against this amendment is that it seems to have originated with a studied care that the farmer, under the guise of receiving a benefit, will absolutely receive nothing; that almost with studied determination they have eliminated—those who are responsible for this farmers' free-list bill—everything that would operate as a substantial benefit to him.

Now, following this matter a little further. Take a suit of clothes. If the farmer, in paying $45 for a tailor-made suit of clothes—which he does not very often do; ordinarily he will buy one at from $20 to $25—could have a tariff of 25 or 40 or 50 per cent ad valorem taken off of the retail price, of course he would benefit very greatly by it. But that suit of clothes is made up of goods which probably did not cost $4 in the market, and probably were imported into this country for $2, and if you, therefore, were to take away a 25 per cent duty you have saved him only 50 cents in the value of the cloth that goes into that suit of clothes.

In a purchase price of $45, how many dollars' worth of his own products must he expend to save that 50 cents? In buying that suit of clothes for $45 he expends $45 in actual goods—worth that much to him—and if he loses his benefit of 25 per cent protection, then you will see that he has lost $11 and has gained 50 cents. So I might follow along all lines of purchases.

I want Senators to understand, and I wish it was in my power to make the farmers of the country understand thoroughly, what the tariff really means to them, how much of a burden it is upon the people, and what part it plays in raising the retail price of any article.

Let me give Senators another little illustration which I believe will be interesting to them. I had my attention called the other day to a new brand of crackers, retailed at 40 cents a pound, made of wheat flour. A bushel of wheat to the farmer in my State who raised it, we will say, is worth 80 cents. That bushel of grain made 44 pounds of flour and 16 pounds of shorts and middlings. That 44 pounds of flour was made into these crackers. The 16 pounds of shorts and middlings would certainly buy the cottolene or the lard that was used to shorten those crackers.

Now, let us do a little computation. Forty-four pounds, at 40 cents a pound, makes $17.60. The farmer got 80 cents for that bushel of wheat. The consumer paid $17.60 for that bushel of wheat. Take off the tariff on wheat and your farmer has lost 10 cents on his bushel. How much difference will that 10 cents a bushel make in the matter of the 44 pounds of crackers in reference to their value? Will it make any difference whatever in their enormously enhanced selling price?

Again, bringing it more directly home to the farmer he sells 4 bushels of wheat for 80 cents a bushel, and he buys his flour under the present rates, and we will say that he pays 50 cents duty. It will cost him that much more on a barrel. The farmer, therefore, in raising 2,000 bushels of wheat will lose $200 on that crop in a year, and, as the American public consume on an average a barrel of flour a year, the farmer will save 50 cents. Balancing your accounts you have a loss of $200 on his wheat crop and you have a saving of 50 cents, and you call that compensation.

Now, I am trying to show, Mr. President, what a mere bagatelle is all of the benefit that the farmer will derive out of this free-list bill. I ask the Senator from Texas—and I ask it for information, because I believe he is not only acquainted with the conditions in the South, which I am not, but that he has also investigated—what the savings will be to the farmers of the Southern States in the matter of bagging. I will say to him I only know it in the Northern States and it amounts to so little, it is so infinitesimal, that I can not consider it of any value to him.

That may be due to the fact that we handle most of our wheat without the use of sacks at all; but I assume that bagging will be used for some purposes in the Southern States; that this bagging will be used to cover the bales of cotton and that the bands will be used for that purpose. I should like to have the Senator, if he will, kindly inform me what the saving would be to the farmers of the Southern States under that provision of the farmers' free list.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I stated yesterday afternoon that I thought the saving to the farmers of the South on free bagging and free ties provided in the bill would probably not exceed 10 cents a bale on their cotton.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator give me an estimate? There are 500 pounds in a bale.

Mr. BAILEY. Thirteen million bales is a large crop. Ten million bales is a small crop. Taking the average crop at 11,500,000 bales, it would mean $1,150,000 to the farmers of the South. When you set it at 10 cents a bale to your small farmer who makes but 8 bales of cotton, netting a saving of only 80 cents, it seems small; but when you take the aggregate of $1,150,000 it is of some consequence.

The Senator from North Dakota will permit me to say further that the provision for free grain bags was not made in the interest of the southern farmer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that.

Mr. BAILEY. It was made in the interest or the supposed interest of the western farmer. The Senator will remember that I myself proposed an amendment in that respect in the Finance Committee. Free burlaps means a loss of $7,000,000 of revenue, and I can not bring myself to believe that it is wise legislation which remits that large amount of revenue upon that single article, which is not one of universal use. However, it is but justice to say to the Democrats, and especially the southern Democrats, to say that they would not propose free dressing for the cotton crop of the South without proposing free dressing for the grain crop of the North and Northwest.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wanted to get it down in percentages if I could. I do not know the value of cotton now, but I presume it is worth about 15 cents a pound. Is it not?

Mr. BAILEY. Hardly that. I think, perhaps, cotton selling in the local markets as far as any is sold—the crop has long since been marketed and only a few of the most prosperous farmers have held and been able to hold their crop——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is $65 or $70 a bale.

Mr. BAILEY. I expect cotton is selling in the local markets of the South to-day at between 13 and 14 cents per pound, and averaging the bale at 500 pounds, that would make from $65 to $70 per bale. Of course, a saving of 10 cents on a $70 bale of cotton is not a very substantial gain.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I was trying to get at is, that the saving would be about one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. BAILEY. But even that is worth saving.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; I am not doubting it. All the way through I am simply trying to demonstrate what the Senator from Texas has so well said, that there is some little benefit, but it is really not a substantial benefit. I want the farmers of the country to understand that they are getting no substantial benefit out of this bill; that was all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator from Texas has been misinformed as to the probable saving to the farmer on his bale of cotton. There are 6 yards of bagging, the average weight is about 2½ pounds to the yard; there are 6 ties, 6 bands, 6 steel hoops to the bale. It is called in local parlance a "pattern." The cost is anywhere from 90 cents to $1.10 and $1.15 per bale for the amount that it takes to cover a bale and put it upon the market.

Under the present ruling of our customhouse officials bagging, on account of certain foreign matter that we have discovered in it, has advanced beyond the ordinary revenue duty, and just now a remittal of that duty, in place of the saving of 10 cents, as indicated by the Senator from Texas—I had the figures here two years ago and gave them to the Senate—would come nearer a saving of from 50 to 60 cents a bale on the bagging and ties if your duties were removed and we were allowed to buy the steel bands free and get our importations of bagging directly from Calcutta in place of having to pay a duty to the Massachusetts manufacturers.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit me? I think I am not mistaken. The duty on cotton bagging is about six-tenths of a cent a yard.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. And it takes about 6 yards to the bale.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I understand.

Mr. BAILEY. Thirty-six tenths would be 3.6 cents on the bagging, and I think probably the duty on the ties will not be more than 7 cents.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Texas, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact——

Mr. BAILEY. It certainly would not be anything like 40 or 50 cents.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The ruling of the customhouse officials has been that on account of the foreign matter in the ties the duty in place of being six-tenths of 1 per cent has been raised to 35 and 40 per cent.

Mr. BAILEY. They did not do it on that ground, and I think they ought not to have done it at all, but they have done it on the ground that the imported bagging did not contain 51 per cent of jute.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is what I said, that it contained foreign matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is a bad ruling, but——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It served its purpose, however, in raising the price of the article.

Mr. BAILEY. The remarkable circumstance was that the man who imported jute bagging had the test made to force him to pay a higher price on it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the terms of the bill under which the ruling was made is examined closely it will be found that if there is one thread of foreign matter in that bagging it will put it under the 45 per cent duty.

But the point that I wish to make in order to set the Senator from North Dakota right, because he is generally very fair, is that in view of the fact that no jute is produced in this country, and in view of the further fact that this bagging is made out of the refuse of the jute vegetable, we could get it at the least from one-quarter to 2 cents a pound cheaper than it is now, and in view of the fact that your burlaps and your higher finished articles come under a higher rate of duty, and they have practically a monopoly of that, and practically, therefore, a monopoly of the refuse that comes from the butts out of which the bagging is made, the six-tenths of 1 per cent, which was the average previous to this new ruling of our customs officials, is not a measure of the relief that would come to the farmer were the bagging from the foreign countries, from India, where the principal part of the jute is raised, allowed to come into this country free, because they get their greater profit out of the finer article, and the duty on that is practically prohibitive. The refuse is made into bagging, and even there the farmers of the country lose something like seven or eight million dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I ask the Senator from South Carolina this question: Does the Senator from South Carolina believe that with the duty removed the farmers who raise cotton would get the full benefit or a benefit equivalent to the amount of duty?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In 1906—I am not very sure, but I will risk that, anyhow; I think that was the year—in 1906, just upon the eve of the marketing of the crop, the American Steel Co. issued an order that there should be a raise of 30 cents a bundle on ties, which extracted over a million and a quarter dollars from the farmers of the country without a moment's previous notice, and the bagging company—there are practically only two in this country——

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator sure that you could avoid that difficulty if you had free bagging?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Surely; because previous to the monopoly of the bagging business in this country we got our bagging cheaper. I am sorry that I have not the figures here that I prepared two years ago.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I appreciate the difficulty of creating a market overnight and changing the course of trade; and while it might be possible that it could be imported for a less amount, so that the farmer could have the full benefit of the tariff removed, I can see great difficulty if there was a combination made in this country or elsewhere in immediately getting that bagging at a cheaper rate, even though a combination were made, and the cotton will not wait for a new competitive plant to be established.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to state, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, that it is now alleged, and those who use bagging believe, that in order to increase the weight and therefore increase the profit the bagging that we have to-day is salted. It is certainly a fact that if you will take a load of bagging and unload it and expose it to the sun and to the air during any kind of a dry period it will lose from one-eighth to a quarter of a pound a yard. Besides that, there is incorporated into it all manner of cheaper articles, so that the six-tenths of 1 per cent measures the duty on jute imported from India, but there is nothing to measure the salt that is in it, nor is there anything to measure the foreign substance that is in it. It is positively so unfit for the purposes for which it is created that it will not hold the hook. Anyone who has been abroad and has seen the condition in which American cotton gets to the market under the foreign bagging manufacture as compared with the previous state when we had pure jute, with its resistant fiber, will understand that the six-tenths of 1 per cent on bagging is like the duty on wool. Woolen goods consist largely of cheap cotton which they buy at 15 cents and sell at $1.25 per pound in the shape of wool. You buy your jute, bring it over here for a monopoly, incorporate the salt and waste, and sell it to the American farmer, and it will not hold the hooks to weigh it.

I for one, not only for the sake of the farmers of the country, but for the preservation of the cotton after it is baled, would rather see the cheap labor of Calcutta or India produce the bagging, for that would give us value received, than to be at the mercy of the Bagging Trust in America, which sells us salt and scrap in place of selling us jute.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am thankful to the Senator for his information. I want to say to him that I asked the question not for the purpose of bringing out any conflict of ideas, but I want to get the matter clearly before the country as to what saving the farmers in different sections will derive by reason of this farmers' free list. For instance, in my own State I know on some articles we get the full benefit of the tariff. We do not get one-half the benefit of the tariff on our wheat, because the difference in price is only about 12 or 13 cents a bushel, while the actual tariff is 25 cents a bushel. While I am acquainted thoroughly with conditions as they are affected by the tariff in my own section of the country, I must plead almost total ignorance of the effect of these tariffs upon the products that are raised by the farmer of the South.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Without desiring to controvert the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, but purely that the RECORD may not mislead anybody, I want to put in the RECORD the actual duty on bagging and ties.

The duty on bagging I have already stated. It amounts to about three and a fraction cents on a bale of cotton. The duty on ties is three-tenths of 1 cent, or half of what the duty on bagging is. I know the Senator from South Carolina does not want to mislead his own people, but if he leads them to believe that they are going to save 50 cents a bale on their cotton in consequence of free bagging and free ties, he will disappoint them. While we failed to procure free bagging in the tariff law, we succeeded in making the duty a low one. If we give it out that we can save 50 cents a bale in the cost of wrapping our cotton, and we do succeed in passing this bill and our cotton farmers only buy their cotton and ties and cotton bagging 10 cents less per bale, they will think we either have not been accurate or sincere. I think the Senator from South Carolina has only to take the quantity of hoop iron in the ties for a bale of cotton and to take the quantity of bagging in the bagging for a bale of cotton, and he will find that my estimate of 10 cents' saving per bale is not very far from what it will actually turn out to be.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to state, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, that I have several letters from dealers in bagging asking what is the probable outcome of this agitation of putting bagging and ties upon the free list, in view of the fact that it has advanced on account of the ruling of the customhouse that the bagging now put upon the market should bear a duty of 45 per cent; I believe that was the ruling.

My estimate that we would save 50 cents or more was not predicated upon the actual duty that is collected now, but upon the fact that within the last four or five years in place of paying 80 cents for the covering for a bale of cotton I myself on my own farm have been forced to pay a dollar and a quarter for exactly the same goods. I have heard of no depreciation or of no less crop of jute in India; I have heard of no less product of the Steel Trust; but there is not a farmer on this floor who wraps his cotton with bagging and ties who will not testify that in the last 10 years we have increased the price of the bagging and the ties on a bale of cotton from 80 cents on a bale to $1.10, $1.15, and $1.20.

Mr. BAILEY. It ought also to be stated that the cotton-bagging manufacturers have done that injustice against the cotton farmers of the South at a time when they had free raw material with which to make cotton bagging.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah if the Senator from South Carolina is through. I do not wish to take him off his feet.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that the Senator will not claim that it is the tariff that has advanced the cost of bagging and ties per bale of cotton from 80 cents to a dollar and a quarter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, by virtue of the tariff on ties and on bagging and a combination of the bagging manufacturers of this country, they have a practical monopoly of the manufacture thereof and, like the Steel Trust, can overnight raise the price to where they please, whereas if there were no duty at all on those articles—because six-tenths of 1 per cent on bagging——

Mr. BAILEY. Six-tenths of 1 cent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Six-tenths of 1 cent, I mean. Practically a cent a yard on bagging is almost prohibitive, in view of the cheapness of the raw material. It only costs about 3 to 4 cents a yard, so the duty is practically 1 cent. You have, therefore, got from 25 to 33⅓ per cent duty on it; and on account of the cheapness of it, that is practically prohibitive. I claim if that duty were removed and competition were allowed to be free in this country and abroad that in place of bagging costing 4 cents a yard, or from 25 cents to 30 cents a bale, we could get it for 2 cents a yard, which was the original price when we had it imported here, thus reducing it by 50 per cent. If it were not for the tariff, if the Senator from North Dakota will allow me, we would use the so-called pauper labor of India; and yet the claim is made on this floor that we are attempting to preserve the laborers of America as against the cheap labor of Europe; and here are the laborers of America producing not a pound of jute or a pound of bagging, but producing the raw materials in America—they are laborers par excellence; they are the men who produce the raw material—and yet you will not allow the laborers of America to enjoy the benefits of the pauper labor of Europe; you put them at their mercy; and you will not allow them to get the product of the pauper laborer of Europe when they can utilize it and increase their own wage.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] made a statement to the Senate that if we had free cotton bagging and free ties it would save the cotton planter of the South 10 cents a bale or thereabout. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] interrupted the Senator from Texas and stated that that was a mistake, that instead of being 10 cents a bale it was nearer 50 cents a bale.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The saving that it would be.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only saving there could possibly be would arise from the protective tariff, and the protective tariff of six-tenths of a cent a yard on 6 yards of bagging required to cover a bale of cotton is 3.6 cents on a bale.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may address myself to both Senators, so as to keep this argument in a logical form as I am going over each of the propositions, we have now arrived at about what the savings would be in the matter of bagging, which I think could be fairly estimated at about one-tenth of 1 per cent upon the value of the cotton; that is, of course, assuming that the farmer will get the full benefit of the reduction of the tariff. Of course there is a very big "if" in that proposition, but in my argument here I will give the farmer the full benefit of it.

I come now to the next proposition, as to which the Senators have preceded me a little in their joint discussion, and that is the proposition of hoops or bands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to that——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps I can correct the conclusion at which he is about to arrive. Will the Senator permit me to do so?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hold in my hand a communication from the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, signed by its president, Mr. W. B. Thompson, which I should like to read for the purpose of correcting the statements thus far made.

Mr. SMOOT. I have a copy of the same letter, I will say to the Senator, and I believe every Senator in the Chamber has one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not pretend to be a monopolist in the possession of the letter.

Mr. McCUMBER. The whole object of this discussion, Mr. President, is to get light on this subject, and I am yielding to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is a very high authority, and this is to give you light. I by no means pretend to be the monopolistic possessor of this information. I am giving it because it seems to be correct. The letter reads as follows:

NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE,
New Orleans, April 12, 1911.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
United States Senator from Mississippi, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to hand you copy of preamble and resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange at a special meeting held on the 10th instant.

I trust that I may be permitted to add a few words by way of explanation and of argument touching this important matter.

The cotton crop of the South yields annually an average of about 12,000,000 bales. Of this total approximately five-eighths, or 7,500,000 bales, representing an average money value of over $500,000,000, are exported and exchanged for foreign gold. The mere statement of these facts attests the importance of the cotton-producing industry, emphasizes the obligation which the country at large owes the producer of this crop, and establishes his right to at least just treatment at the hands of the general law-making power.

Under the present tariff law the duty on steel cotton ties amounts to 0.027 cent per bale, or to $324,000 on a crop of 12,000,000 bales. This tariff is prohibitive, as is shown by the fact that no steel ties are imported. Therefore the Government has no share in this impost, which constitutes simply and solely a tribute levied upon the cotton farmer for the benefit of the Cotton Tie Trust.

The duty on jute bagging imposed by the present tariff law amounts to 0.05¼ cent per bale, or to $630,000 on a crop of 12,000,000 bales. This tariff is to a large extent prohibitive, inasmuch as it yields only about $100,000 in revenues to the Government. The balance of about $530,000 constitutes a tribute paid by the cotton farmer to the Bagging Trust.

Now, this is the point to which I would especially call the attention of the Senator—

But the Bagging Trust is not satisfied with its share of this impost. It desires to raise the duty to a figure which will not only prevent the Government from receiving any revenue therefrom, but will enable the trust to take from the farmer four times as much as it has been able to take heretofore. This trust has recently made a technical test case, based upon a question of chemical analysis, and has secured a ruling thereon from the Board of General Appraisers in New York which will change the duty on imported bagging from the present rate, which amounts to about .05¼ cents per bale, to an ad valorem duty which will amount to about 21 cents per bale.

To that I call the attention of the Senator from Texas—

This means an increase from $630,000 on the crop to practically $2,500,000, all of which the trust will collect from the farmer without any division with the Government.

Thus, under the Payne-Aldrich law as heretofore interpreted, the cotton producer has borne the burden of a $950,000 yearly tax on bagging and ties—

That is not far from the figures of the Senator from Texas, who put it at a million dollars—and if the "chemical interpretation" holds he will hereafter be mulcted in the yearly sum of $2,800,000 for his baling materials, all of which will go into the treasuries of the bagging and tie trusts.

And right there the Senator from Texas was right, as I understood him, in saying that the suit by the decision of which this conclusion was arrived at was brought about by these very people, so that it might be decided against them to their own benefit in future transactions.

The remainder of the letter from Mr. Thompson is as follows:

From the reasons stated it will incontestably appear that not only the proposed outrage but the present tax on bagging and ties is inequitable and wrong; and because the western farmer has now and has had for more than 15 years his binder twine on the free list, the tax upon the southern farmer stands condemned of the additional vice of discrimination.

It is respectfully submitted that the lawmaking power rests under the compulsion of a two-fold duty in the premises. Bagging and ties should be allowed to come in free, not only as an act of justice to the cotton producer but as a penalizing rebuke to the cupidity of the manufacturing combinations which have preyed upon him.

Respectfully,

W. B. THOMPSON, President.

With the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, I will also insert in the RECORD at this point the resolutions of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, which are as follows:

Extract from minutes of board of directors of New Orleans Cotton Exchange, April 10, 1911.

Whereas under the provisions of the Payne-Aldrich law the producer of cotton is and has been paying as tribute to a few manufacturers of bagging and ties a yearly sum amounting to approximately $950,000; and

Whereas the Bagging Trust has recently secured from the Board of General Appraisers in New York a technical ruling which will increase the amount of tribute paid by the cotton producer to the said combination of manufacturers to approximately the sum of $2,800,000 annually; and

Whereas the imposition of this burden, or of any burden, upon the large class of citizens who produce one of the greatest trade assets of the Nation, for the purpose and with the effect of enriching a few individuals who prey upon the industry is not only unjust and indefensible but un-American: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Orleans Cotton Exchange earnestly declares that all bagging and ties used in the baling of cotton should be placed upon the free list: And be it further

Resolved, That Senators and Representatives from the State of Louisiana and those from all the cotton-producing States and from all the United States be earnestly urged to use their efforts to bring about this just conclusion by enactment of the necessary legislation at the present extra session of Congress.

A true copy.

H. G. HESTER, Secretary.

Here is a letter from Mr. C. Lee McMillan, a very distinguished cotton factor in the city of New Orleans, an expert in point of information upon matters of this sort, directed to me, in which he says:

C. LEE MCMILLAN & CO. (LTD.),
New Orleans, April 13, 1911.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I must again beg your kind indulgence and ask that you will please read the inclosed copy of a letter I am sending by this mail to Judge BARTLETT.

While I realize the Senate last time agreed to place bagging upon the free list, and although now there are more Democrats in the upper House than there were at that time, still I feel the cause of the cotton farmer, which you are advocating, is going to require much of your attention, and I hope that you can be patient with me and with my suggestions upon the subject of free cotton bagging.

If Judge BARTLETT can get through the House the bill I have suggested (as per inclosed copy) and you can later get same through the Senate, I assure you there will be no way the Bagging Trust can prevent importations, except by keeping prices so low imports would not pay.

Before closing this, permit me to state that I have thought of but one item of information you have not already been furnished with upon this subject, and same is as follows:

If you are ever in position to ask the Bagging Trust people any questions ask them to explain why it is the trust takes some of the bagging it buys in Calcutta to its Brooklyn mill?

For your information, let me state, the trust puts Calcutta-made bagging through a bath of strongest salt water, thereby adding considerable weight, and as each additional one-fourth of a pound added to each yard enhances its selling value three-fourths cent you can realize that it pays better to take the Calcutta bagging the trust buys up in India to the Brooklyn mill, there load it up with salt, and pay freight on same to the South, than it would to ship all of its foreign-bought bagging direct from Calcutta or Liverpool to the Gulf ports of New Orleans or Galveston.

With my highest regards, I beg to remain,

Yours, faithfully,

C. LEE MCMILLAN.

I have other information of like character, but I do not wish to intrude too much foreign material into the body of the remarks being made by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, the Senator from Mississippi read the letter correctly, but from the reading it sounded like the duty was 27 per cent. Of course it is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; 21 cents is what he said.

Mr. BAILEY. The estimate I made on a crop of 11,000,000 bales——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Twenty-one cents if the decision holds and six-tenths of 1 cent if it does not.

Mr. BAILEY. The estimate I made was a saving of $1,150,000 by the passage of this bill on a crop of eleven and a half million bales. Mr. Thompson, the cotton expert, estimates the saving at only $950,000 on a crop of 12,000,000 bales.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator and he are substantially in accord.

Mr. BAILEY. We substantially agree.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is upon the basis that the duty on the face of the statute prevails, and not the duty as fixed by the decision of the Board of Appraisers.

Mr. BAILEY. I think, Mr. President, the effect of the decision will be this: It will cheat the men who have made contracts for bagging under the belief that they could import that kind of bagging under the duty; and the result of that will be that hereafter we will only import bagging that contains 51 per cent of jute. I think the effect of the high duty as established by this collusive suit would be to force that change.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that 10 cents a bale protection is too high, according to the estimate of this letter, because of the fact that if they——

Mr. WILLIAMS. His estimate is $950,000; and 10 cents a bale would amount to $1,200,000 upon the basis of a crop of 12,000,000 bales, which is his basis of calculation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not 50 cents a bale as I contended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody said that would make 50 cents a bale. It is not quite 10.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I contended in answering the Senator from South Carolina. It is not quite 10 cents per bale.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator from Utah is forgetting is that the duty which is in operation by the decision of that board of appraisers is a duty of 45 per cent ad valorem, which amounts to 21 cents per bale of cotton.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, that is for bagging alone.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question that the cotton planters of the South are not going to import cotton bagging containing less than 51 per cent of jute under the recent ruling; in fact, they could not afford to do so, because the cheap jute bagging would cost them more than 51 per cent jute bagging. So the figures that have been quoted here will have no effect whatever in future transactions, because they can buy cotton bagging containing 51 per cent of jute for not to exceed 3½ cents a yard, and why should they pay 21 cents duty on 6 yards of cheaper bagging?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They thought they were buying jute bagging.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, if it is decided now that bagging containing under 51 per cent of jute could not come into this country at less than 45 per cent, no planter or importer would import cotton bagging in the future unless it contained 51 per cent of jute. So the argument, so far as actual experience and actual business transactions are concerned, will cut no figure whatever in the future.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, I should like to say a word further. In view of the testimony of the expert from New Orleans in reference to ties, and in view of the operation of the bagging trust, just as soon as you get the duty prohibitive, so that there is practically no importation of their articles, as I explained before—I may have been rather unfortunate in my phraseology—the saving would be nearer 50 cents a bale than 10. The actual amount being calculated ad valorem, there would be a saving of 10 cents a bale. If the duty were removed and the price were allowed to go back to where it was under the free importation of bagging and the free importation of ties, the saving would be the difference between $1.20 and 80 cents. That is what I claimed would be the saving if we would remove the duty.

The Senator from Mississippi has read a letter from a firm in New Orleans affirming what I claimed in the first instance, that not only do we pay almost a prohibitive duty on the bagging, but that it is also loaded down with foreign material. The dealers do not ship directly to the small consumers the bagging as they receive it, but salt it down in order to increase their profits, because the minute it is spread out and put upon the bale of cotton every particle of the added weight by virtue of the salt solution is evaporated. If this weight were removed and we could buy real bagging and get our ties without the duty, I still maintain the saving would be nearer 50 cents a bale than 10 cents, as is now specifically and technically calculated upon the actual duties collected.

I am a practical farmer; I make cotton; and I think I know whereof I speak. Let me reiterate—and then I am through—there may be a possible technical saving upon the showing made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Texas, but the real effect will be that you will get bagging that does not evaporate; you will get it from 1¼ to 2 cents a yard cheaper; you will get your ties cheaper; and we have every reason to believe that in place of paying $1.20 a bale for enough bagging to cover a bale of cotton, the individual farmer who buys it—and the negroes and tenants of the South make 72 per cent of the entire American crop—in place of paying $1.20 a bale, will get this covering for 80 cents a bale.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have always heard of the great generosity, of the natural hospitality of our good southern friends. I have had very many occasions to demonstrate the truth of their good reputation. I fear their reputation for generosity is a little shaken by their explanations of the provisions of these amendments. Here is a bill introduced which takes from the northern farmers of three States an annual income of $56,000,000, that absolutely inflicts a loss of that much upon farmers of the two Dakotas and Minnesota, and in the same session that you strike that blow at the farmers of those three States, in the same session that you inflict that enormous loss upon the fellow toilers of the fields, the representatives of the cotton industry—the most important industry in the United States—ask Congress to create a benefit for them of $2,800,000.

Now, I submit to my friends on the other side that you certainly are not upholding your excellent reputation for generosity in that kind of legislation. It may be that the farmers of the South will save $2,800,000. I have such a deep sympathy for every one who toils in the field under the southern sun or in the long northern days that I am predisposed to assist them in every way possible, and I in doing that feel that I ought to have something of a reciprocal sentiment from them. If I am asked to vote for a proposition which will save the cotton growers of the South $2,800,000, am I not entitled to ask of them that they vote with me to defeat a proposition that will entail a loss upon my people of $56,000,000?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that if the reciprocity bill is passed there will be a reduction to the farmers of the Northwest alone——

Mr. McCUMBER. Of three States alone.

Mr. REED. Of three States alone of $56,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what the Senator from North Dakota stated.

Mr. REED. In other words, the people are now paying $56,000,000 a year more for their wheat from these three States than that wheat will bring after the bill is passed.

Now, will the Senator from North Dakota please answer this one question directly and categorically? Who pays that $56,000,000?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not answer an erroneous question categorically or in any other way. The loss upon the 250,000,000 bushels of wheat per year of the three States, at 10 cents a bushel, is $25,000,000.

Mr. REED. Well, I——

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I am going to answer the question. But I am first going to make the question right.

Mr. REED. I will include the other grains that the Senator included in his statement, so that we will not cavil over that.

Mr. McCUMBER. That means 10 cents a bushel. That 10 cents a bushel measures the farmer's profit in a year under the present conditions. This 10 cents a bushel he is entitled to for the same reason that he is entitled to a profit upon his labor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, let me answer it. Therefore the public are not injured if they pay a reasonable profit to that farmer any more than the farmer is injured if he pays an honest profit to the manufacturer and the laborer.

Therefore, Mr. President, admitting that the consumer, if you see fit, pays the amount, then the consumer pays no more than he should.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. But I have to answer the question thoroughly.

Assuming, now, that the consumer pays the 10 cents a bushel a year, and each consumer utilizes one barrel of flour a year, by removing the duty the consumer, then, has saved 50 cents a year, or at 10 cents a bushel for 4½ bushels, 45 cents. In other words, he saves 45 cents a year by reducing the farmers' business to no profit. In other words, he pays 45 cents a year in order that the farmer may have a most meager profit, and that means 4 cents a month; that means but one-thirtieth of 4 cents for a single day.

Now, I say that the consumer can well afford to pay that little profit and that little addition, if it is charged to him, in order that the farmer may have a reasonable profit upon his produce.

Mr. REED. I knew I could not get a direct yes or no answer from the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is in error.

Mr. REED. I am going to ask him the question again.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can always get a direct answer from me to a direct question. The question asked was not one that could be answered directly yes or no; and even if it could be, the Senator could not dictate what my answer should be, provided it was explanatory.

Mr. REED. I did not desire to dictate, but I say now that my question was direct, was susceptible of an answer direct, and it was this: The Senator states that the farmers of the three States he has named receive $56,000,000 annually more for their wheat—and was it barley and rye?

Mr. McCUMBER. Barley and flax.

Mr. REED. Barley and flax—than they would receive if this bill was passed. I asked the Senator the simple and direct question: Is it not the consumer who has to pay that additional $56,000,000? Now, will not the Senator just answer that yes or no and then make his explanation?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator was certainly not listening to me if he did not hear my answer to that—that the public did pay it; that the consumer did pay it.

Mr. REED. Very well. One question further——

Mr. McCUMBER. Now wait. The consumer did pay that. Now, if the consumer by paying that has paid the farmer more than the farmer was entitled to, then there is an injustice upon the consumer. But if taking into consideration what the farmer has to pay for the things he purchases, the amount he receives for his product is only a very meager, fair compensation, the public have no right to complain. That is the complete answer.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for just a moment further?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Of course, the latter part of the Senator's argument—not his answer, but his argument—is a general argument from the protectionist standpoint. I do not intend to argue that with him now. He has given great study to this question, and I simply wanted to get that admission, which I now have obtained, that whatever increase of price there is upon grains comes ultimately out of the pockets of the consumers.

Now, I wanted to call attention to one thing. The Senator figures $56,000,000 as the increase of the price of farm products—that is, farm grains, flax, and barley, and wheat—for three States each year. Has the Senator figured the amount for all of the States?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; but these are the principal grain States which are directly affected. The Chicago market is not benefited 10 cents a bushel, probably. The Kansas City market receives a benefit, but not to the same extent. It is probable that the San Francisco market in wheat receives no benefit whatever. It is probable that the New Orleans section receives only that little benefit, that indirect benefit, which comes from a higher price on similar articles, which is rather light. But the benefit is very important to the three States I have mentioned.

Mr. REED. I understand, then, that the Senator concedes there is no substantial benefit to any of the States except the three States he has mentioned?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, no——

Mr. REED. That it does not benefit in Kansas City, and I can say to the Senator, for I live there——

Mr. McCUMBER. Do not make that statement, Mr. Senator. I did not say they did not get the benefit. I said they did not get the same benefit.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator, then, give us an estimate of what proportion of the benefit these other States would get? You get 10 cents a bushel. How much do you think the rest of the country gets?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator asks a question which is impossible to answer in dollars and cents. I can only explain to the Senator how all of these estimates will be made. The Senator knows that if oats, for instance, which is used for feed, is considerably higher in any year than it has been in previous years, that of itself will create a greater demand for a substitute, which we will say is barley, and the increased demand will raise the price of barley. When oats and barley are both very low, corn under ordinary conditions goes down with them, and when one of these articles which is used for food goes up, the other tends to rise by reason of the demand created for the other articles, and it raises the value of that. No man has statistics on it. No man can compute it. We only know of its general influence in raising values. Wheat is an article of ordinary consumption, and the general world's supply and the world's demand fix a sort of a level, not an actual level, but what we may call nearly the world's level.

Local conditions make values higher here and lower there. Many conditions affect it, but they all have an effect upon the value of that product. And if the prices of wheat are higher in one section of the country the very fact that they are higher there, that there is a shortage, for instance, of No. 1 northern in the country, as I have explained to you, sends the millers of Minneapolis and Duluth down into the Chicago market, and they begin to buy up and create a demand for No. 1 red, which can be mixed with the No. 1 northern, that demand raises the value of the No. 1 red. I can not tell you in dollars and cents because there are no statistics by which we can measure the influence of the price of one product upon another, but every man who knows anything about trade knows of that influence. I think I have answered the question as far as it is susceptible of being answered.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield?

The Senator's answer to my question as to the amount or per cent of benefit the rest of the States would receive from this tariff or have received from it reminds me of the line of the old song—

The longest way around is the shortest way home.

The Senator challenged——

Mr. McCUMBER. Sometimes it is the surest way home.

Mr. REED. And sometimes it is the only way to avoid walking directly into a cul-de-sac.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator wants to be fair, I know, and I think if he will stop one moment he will give me credit for being most fair in my explanation as to what extent the value of one product modifies the value of similar products.

Mr. REED. I give the Senator credit for the utmost sincerity of purpose; I give the Senator credit for having given this subject special study; and I asked these questions with a sincere desire to get some light. The Senator this morning challenged the Senators from the South to a mathematical statement of how much their States would be benefited by this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; let me answer the Senator right here. I did that because the question I propounded was capable of mathematical demonstration, and I will say that the Senators were kind enough to give me the answer in a mathematical demonstration, just the same as I have given you the accurate statement of the losses upon certain products.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to press this matter importunately, but, if possible, to get at a conclusion. The Senator for some reason is able to give us what he calls a mathematical demonstration regarding the losses upon wheat in Minnesota and the two Dakotas. He asserts it will be 10 cents a bushel. That influence of 10 cents a bushel certainly does not run sharply to the red line of the map that divides those States from other States.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I am trying to explain to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Ten cents a bushel up to that line, and capable of mathematical demonstration and certainty, and then suddenly to enter the realm of uncertainty where there is no possible estimate that can be made. I wanted to ask the Senator if he could not give this body and the country the benefit of his opinion and judgment and estimate as to the amount in the aggregate the prices of wheat and flax and barley have increased in the entire country, if he has any estimate of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator is through, I will answer the question.

Mr. REED. Yes, if you can make an estimate; because, Mr. President, to be frank with the Senator, if there is going to be a tax of 10 cents a bushel levied for the benefit of the farmers of North Dakota and Montana I want the farmers of Missouri to get their 10 cents a bushel. I do not want any tax levied the burdens of which fall on all the people of the United States and the benefits of which are limited to three States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, does Missouri produce any barley?

Mr. REED. A little.

Mr. McCUMBER. How much?

Mr. REED. I can not tell you. I have not been a student of this question from that standpoint. I have not been trying to tax the rest of the world for the benefit of my State. I can say to the Senator from North Dakota that the farmers of Missouri do not ask for any protection. They simply want a fair field and no favor, and they will meet the competition of this round world and beat it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose, Mr. President, that we have all kinds of farmers in all sections of the country. I have a good many letters from farmers in Missouri and they are just as intense upon this question as the farmers of North Dakota. They may be mistaken, it may be only a few, it may be only the ones who wrote to me, because the farmer does not generally write at all unless he is worked up to a pretty high pitch of excitement over a proposition.

But, now, I want to get right back and answer the Senator. He wants to know the line of demarcation between the 10 cents a bushel and that which would be less than 10 cents a bushel.

Mr. REED. That was not my question. I want to know your best estimate of the total amount of addition to the price of these three grains upon all the grain raised in the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the great trouble with nearly all the Senators who have tried to argue the wheat question seems to have been a sort of a total lack of knowledge as to where the different kinds of grain were raised, what it was used for, into what markets it generally went, and where was the usual course of trade, and the hundred and one things that bear upon it.

As I stated in a previous discussion of this question, they seem to think that the surplus of this country was as though it was in a single bin, and that if you draw from a part of that bin it would lower the surplus throughout the entire bin. They seem to forget entirely the breadth of our own country, the different sections into which it is divided, and the course of trade. They seem to fail to understand that there might be a shortage of grain in the Northwest to meet the millers' demand, of the kind of grain that would be required, and could not be supplied from the San Francisco district or from the New Orleans district on account of the great distance and the freight. They seem to take cognizance of but one fact, that there are 650,000,000 bushels of wheat raised and there are 100,000,000 bushels to export in wheat and flour, and as long as we export any of it its price must be generally about the same and fixed by the world's demand.

I have tried to make that clear, Mr. President, in previous arguments upon this occasion, but I can be definite as to some localities. I know the kind of grain that is raised up in the Northwest. I know where its market is. I know what its value is. I know what it is used for. I know the comparative price between that grain and the price on the other side. I know that the grain on one side is sold upon a market whose price is established by the home demand. I know that the mighty surplus upon the other side is sold upon a market whose price is established by the world's demand and not the home demand. I know that the amount of the surplus on the other side is so enormous that it would supply our entire demand upon this side and would still leave an enormous balance for export. I know that the logical, the conclusive, the only result would be that we would both be placed upon the export basis. Knowing what the difference between the export basis and the home-demand basis is, I take a period of 10 long years, and I can make an actual estimate and apply it to the crop during those 10 years and get a sufficiently accurate result upon which I can base my judgment.

I used the 10 cents a bushel, first, because it was ultraconservative, and, second, because it made it more easy of computation. I was using it only as a matter of illustration. As a matter of fact, the difference averages about 13 cents a bushel for the last two or three years. But, lest there might be some question about that being the average, I have taken the lower amount of 10 cents a bushel. If we raise and sell, under the ordinary conditions of a full crop, 250,000,000 bushels of wheat in those three States, and the difference is 10 cents a bushel, then I know that if we would be placed upon an export basis we would be losing 10 cents a bushel, and that 10 cents a bushel on 250,000,000 means, in round numbers, $25,000,000.

Now, I take the barley, that which is raised down in the Senator's own State. I do not know just how much is raised there, but, assuming that the farmers raise a fair amount, the difference between Canadian barley and Minnesota barley over the line has been for the last year a difference equal to the tariff of about 30 cents a bushel. I can then multiply the difference of the price by the number of bushels, and it will very accurately measure the loss. In some years—in 1910, for instance—there was a very little crop raised up in the Dakotas, but I am estimating that the three States will raise about 250,000,000 bushels if the three States are raising a normal crop with their present cultivation.

The Senator must see that if barley was worth a dollar a bushel, the highest I have ever known it to be in Milwaukee during the last year, and it was worth only from 50 to 70 cents a bushel over on the Canadian side, and they had a surplus in Canada which they would either have to consume at home or export, then we are getting a benefit, and the farmer of Missouri shipping his barley up into Milwaukee for $1 a bushel is making money on his barley. He is getting a direct benefit, and with that much difference he certainly can afford to ship it to Milwaukee, although that may not be the nearest market, and possibly not the most profitable market; but he is securing a benefit from that duty on barley.

It is impossible, as I said before, to estimate how much Iowa gets out of this. Iowa's market for the most part is Chicago, but the wheat and the barley of Iowa will be influenced by the value of the wheat and the barley of the Dakotas and Minnesota, how much no man can tell. We only know that an increased demand always increases the price, and when there is a higher price of any one article it creates a demand for other similar articles that can be used as a substitute.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator think if he gets——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). The Senator from Missouri will please address the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Always, with pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I apologize to the Chair. I thought by consent of the Senator from North Dakota I had the floor to interrogate him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Whenever a Senator——

Mr. REED. I will observe any rule, however technical, with great pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the rule. When a Senator desires to interrupt another Senator who is speaking, he must first address the Chair and receive recognition, and then must be recognized as entitled to speak.

Mr. REED. I fully understand the rule, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to state the rule to the Senator, whether he understands it or not, if he disregards it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. I am not disregarding it. Would the Senator say that the rest of the country get half as much benefit as the three States that he is especially interested in?

Mr. McCUMBER. After having stated the general proposition, the intelligence of the Senator from Missouri, his general information upon trade matters is such that he can probably answer as accurately as I can. When I have stated that it could not be reduced to dollars and cents or even percentages, I have stated a fact which is self-evident to the Senator, which is as conclusive as it can be made. So if I would answer the Senator my opinion would be no more convincing to him than it is at the present time.

Mr. REED. I simply desired to get the Senator's opinion, and I understand now he can give none; that——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator does himself an injustice when he says that I can give none, because if the Senator—who certainly represents a State with great agricultural interests and who, true to those interests, investigates the commercial relations of the products of his State—is unable to answer the question, I am unable to answer it for him. But the Senator does know, for instance, that if the price of what we call northern wheat goes up, the price of red, the wheat of the Central States, always rises some. He will know that if the prices of barley and oats go up there is some similar relation with corn that is used for the same purpose. When he says that I admitted that I can not answer the question as to whether it benefits or not, the Senator is inaccurate in his statement.

Mr. REED. I do not want to be misunderstood, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. REED. I do not want to misquote the Senator. I have been very sincere in my desire to get an estimate of the Senator, based on his own judgment and his own investigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator must remember that the estimate I make on this year will not be wholly applicable to conditions, which may be different, another year.

Mr. REED. I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would have to take each year separately, and then I would have to take one kind of grain and compare the rise and the fall of that particular grain in that year with another grain of a similar character, which can be used for the same purpose, and see what effect the rise and the fall on the one would be. That, the Senator should see, would be so changeable that I could not reduce it to an estimate that would be satisfactory to either of us. Yet the fact would never be denied by either of us.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator hardly allowed me to conclude, but since his response let me pass this observation. The same difficulty which he speaks of as existing with reference to an estimate of the amount of money that is paid to the farmers outside of the Dakotas and Montana exists, of course, in making his estimate with regard to Montana and the Dakotas.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I thought that certainly the Senator would take one of two positions, either that this 10 per cent raise operated in general throughout the country and gave the country a general benefit substantially the same throughout, or else he would admit that its benefits were limited to those local markets immediately contiguous to the Canadian line, or that he would take a third position, that the benefits throughout the country could be approximated, so that you could say if it raised it 10 per cent in these three States it certainly raised the price 5 per cent on a similar amount in the other States.

What I was trying to get at, what the American people are trying to get at, in my judgment, is how much, if anything, does this tax on wheat cost the man, the woman, and the child, the farmer and the laborer, the minister and the lawyer, the 90,000,000 people who eat bread? We know, according to the Senator's statement, that we are to pay $56,000,000 to three States. I want to know how much we are to pay to all the States for the bread that sustains life.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose, Mr. President, it operated even 10 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat that is raised in the United States. I want the Senator to get that now, because he seems to want a question to be answered many times before he fully comprehends it. I have stated that suppose the entire charge was made to the people of the United States of 10 cents a bushel, which would amount to 44 cents upon a barrel of flour, and that each individual consumed a barrel. That is approximately correct. Each individual would then pay to the farmer an additional price, if the farmer got it all. Of course he is not getting it all, nor would the consumer get the full benefit if it was taken away. But I am giving the Senator the benefit of every possible doubt. Then the consumer would pay an addition of 44 cents a year, or about 4 cents a month. That would be a loss to the consumer of one-thirtieth of 4 cents a day. If the Senator will multiply that by 92,000,000, as a lightning calculator, he will then get the entire amount that the consuming public would pay in addition for their flour, assuming, of course, that they did pay all of this sum.

But, Mr. President, they do not pay it all. I am doubtful if the difference of 10 cents a bushel would make one penny's difference in the price of a barrel of flour. Its proportion to the price of the barrel is so small that the great manufacturers seem to scarcely take it into consideration. I am, therefore, very doubtful if the public would get any benefit by reason of taking it off, and it may be doubtful if they pay one-quarter as much as my estimate would be by reason of its being on.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Missouri must understand that the difference of 10 cents a bushel in the value of the wheat has never made any material difference in the selling price of flour. If he will look over the statistics and the Statistical Abstract he will find that that little difference is not considered at all by the miller in fixing his established prices. That the miller would make something, that he would save 10 cents a bushel, there is no question, but I doubt very much if you take it off if the consumer would get any benefit whatever.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think I have answered each query of the Senator very thoroughly. I want to go a little further and I will answer another proposition, because I noticed in the debate a short time ago that the Senator from Missouri questioned the fact whether or not the laborers of the city were paying less expended energy in the purchase of a barrel of flour than was expended by the farmer in producing that barrel of flour.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. That becomes a most important factor in determining whether or not the farmer should be benefited——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. Because, Mr. President, if the amount of expended energy in the city produces a result three or four or five times as great as the expenditure of the same amount of labor upon the farm, then there is something to be righted in our trade relations, and it becomes our duty as representatives of all the people to do what we can to right those conditions. I want to give attention for a moment to that condition. I will now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that in selecting a small unit to determine the weight or burden of a tax that burden and weight may be reduced to what seems to be a trifle. He lacked one step of going far enough in his hypothesis with reference to the wheat crop of the United States. As I understand, the wheat crop last year approximated 700,000,000 bushels.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; about——

Mr. GORE. Six hundred and ninety-five million, to be exact.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is less than 675,000,000, but that is close enough for your estimate.

Mr. GORE. Six hundred and ninety-five million.

Mr. McCUMBER. Six hundred and seventy-five million.

Mr. GORE. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right; give it at that.

Mr. GORE. I will take it at 700,000,000, in order to make the calculation easy. If the hypothesis be true that each bushel is advanced 10 cents by the tax, then the total increase in the crop was $70,000,000. According to the Senator's contention, the farmers of the United States on his hypothesis would have received $70,000,000 more for the wheat crop last year, on account of the tariff, than they would have received without the tariff. Does the Senator think that on that hypothesis the farmers would have received last year $70,000,000 on account of the tariff for nothing?

Mr. McCUMBER. Had we free trade with Canada last year the farmers of our section of the country would have suffered about one-third of that in actual loss in the three States.

I have stated to the Senator over and over again that I do not think every bushel of wheat in the United States is benefited 10 cents a bushel by reason of the tariff, and the debate has been so long upon that subject that I think the Senator will not presume to press that part of it any further.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE. I should like to place the exact figures in the RECORD. The crop was 695,443,000 bushels. I realize that the Senator did not state that there would be a net advance of 10 cents on the entire crop in the United States, but I will bring it to the three States which he designates—Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. As I understand the Senator, he contends that the farmers of those three States realized last year $56,000,000 on account of the tariff more than they would have realized without the tariff. Is that correct?

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator repeat his last statement, because my attention was called away?

Mr. GORE. I say the proposition is that it advanced the entire crop throughout the United States 10 cents. I do not understand that to be your contention, but that is your hypothesis. But I do understand the Senator's contention to be that the farmers of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota realized last year on account of the tariff on grain $56,000,000 more than they would have realized without the tariff.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; to be accurate, I did not state that. I stated that under normal conditions with our present land under cultivation we have never raised in the three States 250,000,000, I think, but with the present amount of land under cultivation and the usual proportion sowed for wheat and with ordinary weather conditions the three States would now produce about 250,000,000. I desire to correct the Senator so that my statement may stand irrespective of what the estimates may be for the past years.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, the Senator embraces in that $56,000,000——

Mr. McCUMBER. Three States. I will state to the Senator there are hardly 100,000 of barley, I think, raised in the three States. When I spoke of barley I spoke of the northwestern barley States, which might include Wisconsin and other States.

Mr. GORE. Then, on the conditions which the Senator suggests, I ask him if the farmers of those three States realized $56,000,000 on account of the tariff for nothing?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President, they did not realize it for nothing. Now, let the Senator finish his question and I will give him a full answer.

Mr. GORE. I wish to know if they received $56,000,000 more on account of the tariff than they would have gotten without the tariff?

Mr. McCUMBER. That has been answered over and over again.

Mr. GORE. I wish to know what value they returned for that $56,000,000, what value they parted with for the $56,000,000 that they got on account of the tariff, and if it was due to the tariff?

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator through with his question?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I am.

Mr. McCUMBER. They parted with a 60 per cent duty on their clothes; they parted with a duty upon everything that they purchased; they parted with extra taxes; they shared in paying a great national indebtedness; they incurred sacrifices in building up their own State; they parted with large sums of money to educate the people of the State; they parted with large sums of money for the benefit of other sections of the United States; and having parted with those, they do not feel that it is just to them that there should be turned over now a great market, built up by their sacrifices, built up by their labors in past years, built up by their enthusiastic support of a policy that would increase the population and the home demand for their products, that they should now surrender that home demand for the benefit of those who have sacrificed nothing, who have endured nothing in the past, and who will pay nothing in taxes or anything else in the future for the benefit of the country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we are leaving the real question at issue and we are going back into academic questions, which it was not my purpose to discuss. I have tried to be fair with Senators in interruptions, and doubly so am I glad always to get the good views of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. That is very kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate the very eloquent and very comprehensive answer which the Senator from North Dakota has returned and his catalogue of what the farmers receive for the $56,000,000, yet I do not quite understand what value they parted with in order to get the $56,000,000; and I will suggest that if they received the $56,000,000 on account of the tariff, then somebody parted with $56,000,000 to those farmers on account of the tariff.

Mr. McCUMBER. The millers parted with a considerable portion of it, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. What did the people who parted with the $56,000,000 get for the $56,000,000?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think I have answered the Senator's question very thoroughly. If he wants detailed answers, I will say that the millers parted with considerable of it; that the millers paid a better price for the grain than they would have paid if they had had Canadian grain, and therefore the millers paid some of this. I will say that the brewers paid some of it. The brewers paid a higher price for their barley. It may be that the brewers ought to be protected in a better way than they are and ought to be allowed cheaper barley; but when I look at the mammoth homes of the brewers, when I look at their palaces scattered all over the country, and then when I look at the little farm hovels over the entire United States, with their inhabitants having scarce enough to wear of good clothes, when I think of the number of people who serve and wait upon the pleasure of the brewer, I am not inclined, Mr. President, to want to enhance his profits at the expense of the farmer.

What I can say generally of the brewers I can also say of the great millers of the country, and I am certain that the taking off of this tariff will inure to their benefit. Very little benefit, if any, will go to the general consumer. I have several times over covered the subject of what the consumer would pay.

Now, Mr. President, I will agree partly with the Senator from Oklahoma that if we are all to go upon a free-trade basis, of course that presents an entirely different proposition, but assuming that we are still to continue upon a tariff-protection basis, I want to consider now the farmer's condition compared with the condition of other laborers of equal intelligence.

I was told the other day by a contractor the prices that he paid for his help in building. He pointed out in one instance a sleepy sort of individual, who sat for eight hours in an elevator, and upon the ringing of a bell lazily pulled a lever on one side and sent the elevator up, and, waiting a few minutes until there were two rings, pulled the lever the other way and he went down. For eight long hours he continued in that very active work, and received for five and a half days the sum of $36, or over $6 per day. I find that the bricklayer, I find that the plasterer, I find that the carpenter, I find that the stonecutter, and also the paper hanger are receiving about the same rates. I go to the bricklayer, and I find he is paid by the hour, instead of by the day, and he receives 62½ cents per hour.

If the Senator will follow that out and take the number of hours in a year at some 3,000 and multiply it by 62½ cents per hour he will get the wages of the ordinary laborer; certainly a laborer who is not more intelligent than is the farm laborer—at least, he need not be—because in order to raise crops we have to receive a technical education and we have to invest a large sum of money as capital. After estimating the amount that this laborer receives per day, I go back to the farmer who works on an average of 12 hours a day, and I find by as careful an estimate as can possibly be made, that he receives for that labor the beneficent sum of about 6½ cents per hour. Then you have your city laborer at 62½ cents an hour and your farm laborer at 6½ cents per hour, the city laborer receiving 10 times as much for his energy expended per hour as the farmer receives.

What has been the result? The result has been that you have built up a high cost of living in the city which is out of all proportion to what it ought to be, so that we are seeking some means to alleviate the condition of the man who is working for a definite salary. With that high price of labor your building costs you 10 times as much as it would if constructed with farm labor. Your land then takes on an enormous value.

The result is that everything that is handled in such buildings, erected upon a foundation of gold created by the higher price of the American laborer, takes on a higher value, and you must tax the purchaser to pay it. Then, because your prices are high, you go back to the farmer, who is not responsible in any way or in any degree for the higher cost of living, and you immediately shave down his profits to a mere existence, in order that the balance of the world may live upon his labors and live as well as they have been living. And you call that justice to the farmers of the country. Then, in the face of the injury that you have created, you offer him this sop, which you call the farmers' free-list bill, and from which the best of you can not establish to any certainty that he will get any benefit whatever.

Mr. President, I have, in all the years that I have been here, tried to impress upon the Senate the real condition of the farming public of the United States; I have tried to have them understand that the farmer is not receiving his just deserts for the labor that he and his family are daily performing; but the average Senator, the average Member of the House of Representatives, looks upon him in the same light as does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], when they consider him a mere necessity in the economy of living, as an individual intended by God Almighty to furnish food that the rest of the people may live in ease and comfort. Anything that tends to raise the value of his product so that he shall receive a compensation for his labor, one that will more nearly equalize his compensation with the labor compensation of other individuals, is looked upon as something dangerous to the American people, and he is answered with the cold proposition that the other two-thirds of the American people will not submit to having the price of the loaf of bread increased to them and to their families.

The Senator from Ohio speaks in kindly terms of the farmer; he seems to have an affectionate regard for him; but when it comes to putting that affectionate regard into the form of a benefit, both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Ohio balk and say, "We can not do that." We can not afford to allow the farmer any more than he is now receiving, and lest his products might raise in value, we must have this Canadian reservoir ready.

The Senator from Ohio dilates upon the great men who have come from the farms of the United States. Mr. President, if great men come from the farm, it is because of the triphammer of poverty that makes human character, that, with its heavy stroke upon stroke, hardens the individual and makes him capable of resistance, that gives him a power of endurance and enables him to walk out into the world and to meet the world with a courage and a confidence that you can not find in the hothouse flower of the city. But, Mr. President, would the Senator from Ohio keep the farmer in poverty that he might be the breeding ground of strong American characters? It is against that proposition that we who represent farming constituencies rebel.

Every Senator knows if he has carefully estimated the earning capacity of people on the farm that their earnings really are not one-fourth of what labor of equal intelligence receives in the city. I say here that the farmers are entitled to the same amount, and I say that the country would be in better condition if we could equalize the earning power of the whole rural districts until they would be an inviting field for the men and the women of the cities.

But I am told "Ah, this is an idle dream"; that there should be as much wealth displayed in the country as in the city.

Mr. President, if by any character of law I can make the farmer's product worth more than it now is, then it is my moral duty to make it so, but instead of assisting the great class of citizens who need your help more than any other class in the United States, a benefit to whom would benefit the whole country and take your excess population out of the cities, your first blow is at the farming population—those who earn the least—and you take from them every vestige of protection, while continuing to protect those whose earnings are the greatest.

I wanted to ask my Democratic friends to mention some benefits that will inure to the farmers of this country by reason of the farmers' free-list bill. I take agricultural machinery, and I ask the author of the amendment if he can tell me where the farmer will get his machinery any cheaper if we take off the tariff, and he says, if I recall rightly, the farmer will get no benefit. This is one of the principal items, and the author of the amendment admits it is a sop to the farmer and gives him no real benefit whatever.

Then I take bags and bagging. This reciprocity treaty will not injure the cotton raiser of the South. It will injure the wheat raiser of the North. Then, under the pretext that you are to give a benefit to the farmer, you give a benefit to the farmer who is not hurt, and you refuse to insert in your free-list bill anything for the benefit of the farmer who is hurt.

Then I take the articles of hoops and bands. I want to get that matter definite. I understand that the tariff upon hoops which are used to bind cotton would amount to 2.7 cents. That is my information from the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a saving, if you get the entire saving, of 2.7 cents on a value of $65 for a bale. It is a bagatelle, though taken in the aggregate, of course, it amounts to considerable; but there is nothing for the farmer you hurt, no salve for the wounds that you inflict upon him.

Then I take the next item, boots and shoes, which it is proposed to put on the free list. When boots and shoes are on the free list, are you to get boots and shoes any cheaper? We reduced the duty on them down to 10 per cent. Did we get them any cheaper? The difference in cost on account of the tariff on the leather, which you took off, amounted to only about 3 or 4 cents on the very best pair of shoes, and will the shoe manufacturer make a difference upon a shoe, the price of which he never divides into smaller division than 50 cents? On a $2, a $2.50, a $3, or $3.50 shoe is he going to make a reduction of 3 or 4 cents? So, here again you have given the farmer absolutely nothing.

Then I come to barbed wire. You say you will give the farmer some benefit on barbed wire. Mr. President, where is he to get it? Is anybody importing barbed wire into the United States? We are exporting barbed wire, and we are jumping over tariff walls to do so. If that is the case, if we can manufacture barbed wire so cheaply that we can get into other countries with it, is there much danger of other countries coming into ours with their barbed wire? Who manufactures it abroad? The same condition applies to barbed wire as applies in the case of farm machinery. No foreigner would attempt to construct a plant to manufacture farm machinery to sell to the people of the United States unless he could get a guaranty that for 15 or 20 years at least he would not have any tariff to pay, and neither you, nor I, nor anyone else can give him that guaranty. Therefore he will not enter into the business of competing with the American manufacturer. So we get nothing out of that.

I turn to your next proposition—that is, beef and veal and mutton. It is a new proposition that you are going to benefit the farmer by lowering the duty on the thing which he produces—his protection. I do not care whether the protection is direct or indirect. I believe that the tariff is 1½ cents a pound on those articles. Well, we are exporting meat to Canada; we are exporting canned meats elsewhere. We are consuming about all of the meats that we produce in the United States, but the Chicago packers, the Omaha packers, and the St. Louis packers are able, I believe, to compete with the world, and therefore the farmer will get no benefit because no man is going to import meat into the United States.

Then take the item of flour. I have heretofore gone over that, and I have shown you that the difference is so little that it is not worth being taken into consideration at all.

Then we have lumber, and I have shown you that, taking the average amount which the farmer would use to build a house, he would have an actual saving of about 55 cents a year in the difference in the value of lumber, but against this he would have a loss of from $200 to $250 a year, dependent upon the character and the amount of grain that he raises.

I come now to the item of sewing machines. Those who are manufacturing sewing machines do not need any protection at all, and I do not see why the duty has ever been kept on, for the reason that American manufacturers are selling sewing machines abroad and are manufacturing them abroad. If they manufacture them abroad, they probably would not bring them into this country and sell them in competition with their own goods manufactured here. A Singer sewing machine, I presume, costs about from $25 to $30 at retail, and it is good for 30 years. Suppose the farmer did save 10 cents a year on a sewing machine, what is that compared with the enormous loss that you are inflicting yearly upon him by reason of this reciprocity agreement?

Mr. President, I am going to vote for this amendment, but I am going to do so upon a principle, and that principle is this: When you take all the protection from the product of one man you ought not in morals and in justice to retain it upon the product whenever it has been manufactured by some one else. The people of my State not only complain, as they have a right to complain, against the damage, against the general injustice of this reciprocity agreement, but they complain, as they have a right to complain, against the injustice contained in the proposition that they are not treated as the manufacturer is treated. They rebel against that; and it is in conformity with their almost universal demand that I stand as much as I can between them and this outrageous policy that they are not to be treated as having the same rights that are accorded other American citizens, that I shall vote for a proposition that would otherwise be obnoxious to me as a protectionist.

Mr. President, I had hoped that some Senator who favors this amendment would have the kindness to explain to the Senate the benefit the farmer is to get from the free-list bill; but no one has done so, for no one can show a benefit to the farmer that is worth the breath he expends in proclaiming it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	du Pont	Lippitt	Simmons
Bourne	Fletcher	Lodge	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Foster	McCumber	Smoot
Briggs	Gallinger	McLean	Stone
Bristow	Gamble	Martin, Va.	Swanson
Bryan	Gronna	Nixon	Taylor
Burnham	Guggenheim	Oliver	Thornton
Clapp	Heyburn	Page	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Penrose	Watson
Cullom	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Wetmore
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Williams
Dixon	Kern	Shively	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have been in some doubt in my own mind as to whether I would say anything before the vote is taken upon this amendment. It is not in accordance with the policy that I have laid out for myself to attempt to discuss these amendments except where there is a probability or even a possibility of the amendments being adopted. In that case I would feel that I was not performing my duty should I allow them to come to a vote without placing in the RECORD such views as I might desire to have accompany my vote.

It is being asserted around me to-day that certain Senators are going to vote for this amendment on the wool schedule, and the reasons have been given. If that policy is prevalent it may be that we will find ourselves with Schedule K amended, and we will have to wait for some years for relief from a condition which would be very embarrassing to the country and those whom we represent, and those whose interests are at stake might say, "In that hour, when this was imminent, you were silent. Why?" I could not say that I was silent because I acquiesced in it from any standpoint or for any purpose. Therefore, I feel impelled briefly to say what I have to say against the enactment of such legislation.

The single question to be voted upon is whether the duty on wool shall be reduced from 11 cents to 3 cents. That is what it amounts to. We have had some experience, and we are not without a guide in this matter. Only once during the lifetime of any one in this Chamber have we had free wool. Schedule K has stood as the law of the land under the McKinley bill in 1890, under the Dingley bill in 1897, and under the existing tariff law. During the period of the Wilson bill or the Wilson-Gorman bill, or whatever you choose to call it, we had free wool—absolutely free wool—with a duty on manufactured articles.

I have sat here and listened with some amazement to a discussion as to the principles of the Democratic Party in regard to these matters, and I have been unable to see how they would reconcile their position under the Wilson-Gorman bill with the position they are assuming at this time. They are now demanding that the manufacturers of wool shall be relieved of their duties and proposing to place a small duty upon the raw wool.

Their action then and their policy now are so utterly inconsistent that it is difficult to explain. But I never was able to give a reason why a man should be a Democrat, and I was never able to explain to myself or anyone else why the Democratic doctrine should be the rule or law of the land; and I will not attempt it now. I will let it stand for itself.

The wool interest, of course, carries with it the sheep interest, because unless the wool is an inducement the sheep will not be raised. This, taken together with the proposed Canadian pact, which allows the sheep to come in free, of course presents the problem of wool and sheep together. You let the sheep in under the Canadian act and the wool in under this act. Of course, under the Canadian act, the sheep might bring in his own wool. He could come over onto this side of the line for shearing, and he could come by the millions. It is safe to say that more than a million Canadian sheep are sufficiently accessible to the boundary line to enable them to come in free, and to make money by coming, and it is safe to say that the Canadian Pacific road and the other roads could well afford to give rates to the sheep coming into this country for the sole purpose of being sheared and taken back.

I have given some attention to that matter, and I do not hesitate a moment to say that the cost would be so insignificant that the sheepmen on the Canadian side of the line, within 50 miles of the American line, could afford to bring their sheep over here on the railroads and shear them—bring them here for a few cents—and derive the benefit that they would derive by getting their wool into our markets free.

I have taken the matter up with some transportation men in order to see whether or not I was mistaken, and I am justified in saying that there is no question but that a very large quantity of wool would come into this country on the backs of the sheep and the sheep would go back to raise more wool.

But that was bad enough, and I raised my voice against that on a former occasion at greater length, but now it is proposed to allow the wool to come in in the fleece because, of course, 20 per cent ad valorem on the prevailing price of wool—3 cents a pound—would not be a deterrent at all and would not keep any wool out of the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with my colleague, as he knows, upon the subject of the general necessity of maintaining protection for the wool industry. But my colleague stated that we now have a protection of 11 cents.

Mr. HEYBURN. Eleven cents.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, that is ostensibly so, but does not my colleague agree with me that, as a matter of fact, the wool-grower only has about 7 or 8 cents now?

Mr. HEYBURN. If I were not afraid of overrefinement in reasoning, I would go into that question. I understand exactly what the Senator suggests, and it is in a measure true that there are certain things to be charged against the 11 cents protection that reduce the benefit derived under it. But then, in discussing a principle of legislation, I think it is sufficient to accept the face of the law and base the reasoning or conclusion upon it.

Mr. BORAH. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that it is another instance based upon the same principle as the reciprocity agreement——

Mr. HEYBURN. Very much like it.

Mr. BORAH. Where the eastern manufacturer gets very much the best of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; there is room for improvement in regard to that matter.

There are certain regulations that ought not to exist in regard to the manner of estimates. But I might go into that at the sacrifice of the general principle which should control. This is a place where principles of law and principles of government should be discussed rather than the details as to their application, and one often enters into a detailed consideration of a political question here at the expense of the question itself.

The large question in regard to the manufactured products of wool that is affected in this bill is in the wages item. This measure would carry with it about $75,000,000 in wages. That is, in connection with the manufactured products alone. It is a question as to which side of the line you are going to drop those wages on. I have taken my figures from the statistics within the last hour, and consequently I have confidence in stating them.

Now, are you going to leave those wages on the other side of the line and bring in the product that has been benefited by the wages paid there and never to come here, or are you going to keep the wages on this side of the line employed in converting our own raw material? Are we going to convert the raw material of other countries through their labor or are we going to convert the raw material of our own country to useful purposes through our wages paid to our own wage earners?

In my judgment, as I have said before, the two questions involved in discussing the question of the tariff are: First, the question, which involves all of the minor questions, of the displacement in our market of our own products displaced by the introduction of the products of other countries. There is a loss that can not be made up in any other or any future or any subsequent stage of the transaction. If a product that is the result of a million dollars paid in labor in some other country comes into our country, whether subject to duty or otherwise, it displaces the products of our own country to that extent, and we have paid the million dollars to the foreigner, and it never comes back to us, and our labor that would have manufactured the articles has not been given the advantages that would result from its work, the wages it would have received.

That is the basis upon which I consider the tariff question. I understand these details are very interesting as to the cost of this item and that item, but they are all involved in the general proposition of wages and displacements in our market.

Those who have been discussing this question have suggested that our remedy would be to find a foreign market for our products. That is such a cruel argument, that is such an unreasonable proposition, that I can not think anyone capable of thinking will agree with it. The idea of opening our market to the foreign product, knowing that we could produce it ourselves, and then when the foreign product has come in, say to our producing capacity, "All right; go ahead and produce it, and you can find a market in some foreign country." There is no patriotism in that, and there is no common sense in it.

The market of this country belongs to the people. It is their property. They created it by the civilization that they builded. In every part of the country they have created this market, and it is theirs. It is no one man's property or right, but it belongs to all of the people.

The primary object of our Government is to afford opportunity to the citizens. It is not to assist them in taking advantage of the opportunity, one as against another. It is to enable them all to stand upon an even footing and enjoy the same opportunity, and having the same opportunity, the Government, in the exercise of quasi-police power, sees to it that the strong do not run over the weak.

In regard to this wool question the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] left an argument in the air yesterday. For fear it may light and create a wrong impression, I will see if we can not pull it down now and investigate it. He read from the statistics the number of sheep in the United States during certain years, and he did not draw any comparison between the sheep and the sheep's products, and I will state it.

He called attention to the fact that the number of sheep did not decrease so much during the Democratic administration, which, while some years ago, is quite fresh in our minds. He called attention to the fact that there were 47,000,000 sheep in the country in 1893, 45,000,000 in 1894, 42,000,000 in 1895, 38,000,000 in 1896, and 57,000,000 in 1910. And he seemed to think that the increase was hardly in proportion to the increase of the population.

Between 1896 and 1910, 14 years, the area—that is, the open area of the country upon which sheep might be raised; that is, the range—had been diminished by about 25 per cent. But it was suggested to him that he had better look to the value of the sheep because if the sheep are worth nothing the more you have then the greater disadvantage are you under. In 1895, which was after the Democratic Party was in power and its policy announced and its tariff law enacted, when the Democratic Party was in the saddle, we had 42,294,064 sheep, worth $66,685,767. That is $1.57 a head.

I saw sheepmen offering sheep at 10 cents a head if the buyer would drive them away and do it quickly, because they were eating up the grass, and there was no market for either the sheep or the sheep's fleece. That was in 1896. That was the year for which I have given these statistics.

Just compare that condition with this year. The increase in the number of sheep is only about 12,000,000, but the increase in the value of the sheep is the difference between $1.57 a head and $4.08 a head. That is where the Senator stopped short. He did not incorporate that statement into his remarks. In other words, the value of the sheep in 1896 was $1.57 a head because of the scant market for them, and it became worse immediately afterwards, and in 1910 it was $4.08 a head, because prosperity had returned to the country and there was a market for the sheep and for the fleece.

Now, attention was called to the effect of a free-trade policy upon the wool market and the volume of production and of import; that is, during the three years when the Democratic tariff was the law of the land, because that is about the length of time it was operative. It was not enacted until 1894, notwithstanding the party came into power in 1893, on the 4th of March. During the Democratic free-trade policy, with wool on the free list, we imported 786,797,405 pounds. That we bought from other countries at the expense of the dissemination of our own herds. During the equivalent period after the enactment of the Dingley bill we imported only 365,459,866 pounds. That was because there was a duty of 11 cents a pound upon the wool, which kept foreign wools out while our flocks were growing again. The difference there is 421,337,539 pounds, as showing the different conditions resulting from the different tariff policy of the country, and no other.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the interest in this measure is lagging, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we will have a call of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has there been a call for the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A call was made for the yeas and nays, and the Chair asked for a second. The Chair will again ask for a second.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Nebraska asked for the yeas and nays. If he does not second it, I do not know that it is worth while for anybody else to do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will withdraw the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws the request for the yeas and nays. The Senator from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Dillingham	Kern	Simmons
Bourne	Dixon	Lippitt	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	du Pont	Lodge	Smoot
Briggs	Fletcher	McCumber	Swanson
Bristow	Foster	Martin, Va.	Taylor
Brown	Gamble	Oliver	Thornton
Bryan	Gore	Page	Townsend
Burnham	Gronna	Penrose	Watson
Chamberlain	Guggenheim	Perkins	Williams
Clapp	Heyburn	Pomerene	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Reed
Cullom	Johnston, Ala.	Root
Curtis	Kenyon	Shively

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we see some queer things here. The only thing that I have not yet seen that I think would be a novelty would be to see some Senator go out while he was speaking. Every other phase of neglect and dilatory tactics has been presented in connection with this legislation. A majority of the body will sit here supinely and neither hear advice nor place themselves in a position to receive it. They seem to have been content to align themselves under different banners, and inscribe on the banner some epithet or title of glory according to the relation that they bore to it.

The Republicans of the Senate are opposed to this Canadian pact. All of the Republicans of the Senate are opposed to it. When I use that term I refer to men who stand for the principles of protection, a protective tariff policy, not protection on some one particular item or class of items, but as a policy of government. Those are Republicans.

There has been some talk with reference to the administration, and it has been thought by some to identify it or classify it as representing republicanism. It does not represent republicanism or any principle for which the Republican Party ever stood. I am not going to indulge in any attack on the personal character or personnel of the administration; I am talking now of political principles.

When this vote is taken there will be a majority of Republicans against it, and those who are not against it will be classed as Democrats and semi-Democrats, real fee-simple Democrats and borrowed Democrats. Fee-simple Democrats and—I will not use the word that came to my mind because it might be taken in an offensive sense, but I will suggest what it was—hired Democrats. I do not intend to use that in a sense which would be offensive. Then there may be one or two deceived Republicans, but I have a rather high opinion of the intelligence of Republicans, and I do not know whether to admit that they are deceived or not. They are misled. And here we stand to discuss this question.

Great interests are at stake. Men's fortunes and happiness are at stake. The interests—and I do not use that term in the sense in which it is used in the newspapers either; I mean the real interests of the people of the country—are divided upon this question, very largely from a selfish basis. That is to say, the people in the cities have been misled into the belief that they will benefit under this measure at the expense of the country, and they are willing to do it. They talk about cheap living. What difference how cheap the living if the man has nothing with which to pay for it? I have heard 20 men speak here from the assumption that every laboring man has always at hand the money to buy things with, and they have discussed only how cheaply he could buy them. Senator after Senator, even to-day, has risen and spoken of the choice that the laboring man might exercise in the market into which he would go for the purpose of buying the things he needed. There is a great big question behind that. If he goes, it matters not where he goes with an empty pocket; he can buy at no price. He does not have an accumulated fund out of which to purchase the necessities of life. He must earn as he spends. That is true as a general statement. Of course there are some exceptions to that, but it is true as to the great mass of the people. They know that they must have employment to-day in order that they may live to-morrow.

What are you proposing to do with them? You are proposing to substitute for the man who must depend upon the labor market a foreigner. I do not care whether he is a Canadian or a Swede or whether he is an Italian or where he comes from, he is not an American. He does not pay taxes for the purpose of the support of our Government or any part of it. He does not live here; he does not vote here, but he lives under the laws of another country and owes fealty to another Government. Yet you are going to give him a preference at the expense of the American citizen, who is as necessary to you, or more necessary to you, than you are to him.

Suppose the country were to conclude that it would live at home. It produces everything it needs, and can produce it even to the clothing that people wear. It can produce everything it needs in the way of food. When I was a boy the neighborhood mills made the cloth and the blankets, and the sheep owner, the farmer, sheared the wool with his own hands. He drove with it to the mill, and he was told, "You may come back here at a certain time." He would go back and he would get those bolts of clothing of different kinds and grades and take them home and put them upon the shelves in the storehouses of the farm. That was not an exceptional condition; I have seen it.

I think some remnants of that still exists in the old, solid, substantial sections of the country.

So the country can live, and live happily, and clothe itself and feed itself and get rich, because it does not have this continual outflow. That is where our ancestors and forefathers accumulated the wealth and the competence and the comfortable living that some of us have enjoyed. There was a small stream only flowing out from that home. The farmer would take the skin from the animal that he slaughtered for food to the tanner to be tanned. He would go back in seven months afterwards and get the leather, heavy or light, as it might be, and bring it home and put it on the shelves. Twice a year the competent tailor and the competent shoemaker would go to the home of those people, or if a smaller family they would go to his place; the tailor would make up the suits of clothes out of the cloth that was made from the sheep that were raised on the farm and the shoemaker would make the shoes for the family, all that they could possibly need between that and the next period. That is living. It was a healthier, better kind of life than the glitter of to-day.

That is the condition out of which the men who stamped their genius and greatness upon this country came. I can go back where those conditions are in a large measure existing to-day. I heard a man well known to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is sitting on my left, say to me, in talking tariff, "I am a protectionist." He said, "I knew the sheep upon which the fleece grew out of which that coat was made. I knew the calf that wore the skin that covers my foot. This hat was made from the silk of my own silkworms, and this gold that carries my watch was mined from my own mines." He said, "Are you a protectionist that good?" That is getting back to the old school, and the best school and the best age this world will ever know.

Mr. President, it is not to throw away or destroy existing conditions, but it is to temper them with that sort of patriarchalism applied to the government of the people, where the people live patriarchal lives, where they produce as though there were no world beyond the boundary lines of the United States, where they barter and buy and sell among themselves. The existence of crime is no constitutional argument to me—that men are violating the law, either natural law or the law of the country, through the forms of trusts—why we should support a measure of this kind that deals with economics of honest men. This country can take care of the rogues, I guess. If it can not, it had better go out of business. If we are to be governed by police law, and if our legislation is to be shaped upon the lines of police government, then the Government is not worth sustaining. Let us act upon the assumption that we are capable of exercising a clean government, regardless of the crimes that are committed or charged.

I will not stop in this hour to determine that crimes are aided, perhaps made possible, by this legislation. But crimes are made possible by the manufacture of the dirk or the pistol or of powder. Is that any reason why those things that are being so used should be destroyed or abandoned?

Mr. President, we are going to have an accounting one of these days. There were 7,000,000 Republican votes cast at the last election, and there are 7,000,000 Republicans in this country. They are as a political principle 7,000,000 times bigger than any man, I care not whether he lives in the White House or whether he stokes the fires in the furnaces of this building. Those men are the Republican Party. It is the Republican Party that I care for, and not the men who happen to be in office for the few brief hours. The principles that the Republican Party stands for constitute Republicanism, and no man, no coterie of men, I care not whether they are high in office or otherwise, can change that fact.

I have seen men purse their mouths and look wise and say the administration has concluded so and so and the policy from this time will be so and so. I have seen the fortunes of government hurl them under, and they were lost under the wheel and never came up again. You will see it. They will be strewn upon the banks after the Republicans of the country realize their betrayal. They will be strewn upon the banks as the wreck of a miserable mistake; that is all.

Mr. President, I do not desire to enter the field of prophecy, but I will predict. That is a mild kind of prophecy. I will predict that after the coming election, which will be a political potpourri, the Republicans who are in the majority of this country, as I say there are over 7,000,000 of them registered, will simply say to the self-constituted leaders who sought to lead them astray, "Step aside now, we will organize ourselves; we will be organized by no man or set of men who have led us up to the trough of free trade and demand that we drink at it." And they will not be heard of. They will select from out the loyal ranks of the Republicans men whom they can trust, or think they can. I merely utter these words of prediction in order to lessen the disappointment which some will experience.

Do you think that those Republicans are going to adopt Democratic principles, or do you think that they are going to indorse those who try to persuade them or compel them to adopt Democratic principles? I do not object to Democratic principles on that side of the aisle; I like them, because I have been accustomed all my life to meet them in the open field of controversy, and generally to prevail against them. They are candid men; they believe in those principles of government, and I believe them when they say they believe in them. But I do not believe men whose record in the Republican Party is as old as the party itself when they tell me to-day that they believe in free trade. Call it what they please, that is what it is. The free list, on the face of the bill called the free list, is free trade. Reciprocity is simply a honeyed phrase with which to tempt those who allow some one else to think for themselves.

The most desperate and the most dangerous man on earth is the man you have persuaded to think wrong, and who has acted upon it. You had better beware of him either singly or in the aggregate—the man you have persuaded to think wrong when he had confidence that you would lead him only aright. When they rise they rend.

Mr. President, there are two bodies of insurgents in the Senate, insurgent Democrats and insurgent Republicans. I regret to see, and I say it in all candor, that a certain number of loyal, true Republicans are persuaded into the belief that they can afford to train with the insurgents for temporary purposes. When I see Senators in whose heart I know it would be impossible to fasten a belief in the doctrines of the other side of this body willing to adopt them for the purpose of vengeance, to use them as a hatchet to hack something with, it appalls me. I do not want to see it. It has been the boast of men that brave men will stand up on the deck of the sinking ship and go down with it rather than flee at the expense of others for whom they are responsible. It is a boast, and it is a proud boast, and it is a just boast.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a very pertinent question? According to the Senator's rule of morals and human duty, does he believe the man who is assaulted, who feel's the grasp of the enemy's fingers upon his throat, while he may have an abhorrence of the general choking business, having no other weapon at hand, finds no justification in shutting off the other fellow's wind long enough for him to release himself?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would not reach out and grasp the body of my brother man and interpose it between myself and any danger that might arise.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose my brother man is the one who has fastened his fingers on my throat?

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I would fight him.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I would do.

Mr. HEYBURN. And go with the issue.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, I think I would fight him with a weapon that was closest, in an emergency.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are some things that ought never to be used as weapons by a man.

Mr. McCUMBER. He can use the same weapon as the one by which he is assailed?

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend, nor do I intend, to reflect upon the earnestness, upon the integrity of thought, or anything concerning those who are going to vote to pull down all the temple because a part of it has been pulled down. I am not going to do that, but I must claim and exercise the power and the right here to speak true to my own sentiments, wherever that may follow.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope, if the Senator will allow me, he will not for a single moment believe that, earnest Republican as he is, protectionist as he is, he would for a single moment make an onslaught upon a general policy, but I think the Senator will agree that there are times when a person must strike back. It is not vengeance, because I have heard that term used so often. It is not through a spirit of vengeance, but in a spirit of fair play, of justice, of equal right to defend yourself, and defend yourself in the only possible and appropriate way.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; there is no time on earth when a man should not strike back when he is assaulted wrongfully. There is no substitute for the duty of defense against your honor or your person.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, then, if this tariff proposal or this reciprocity agreement does not strike, and strike hard, at the agricultural sections of the Northwest, and if they are struck are they not justified in relieving themselves in any possible legitimate way?

Mr. HEYBURN. Now the Senator asks whether they are justified. The question of justification is a very uncertain term. The thing that justifies with one man does not always justify with another. I think that is a personal question to be left to each individual.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator says the man's duty who was assaulted is to strike back.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. He admits, now, the man has been struck. Then my claim is, it is his duty to strike back and strike quickly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Strike back, but do not take some other person as a weapon with which to strike. Let him strike on his own responsibility and abide the issue. All men are of the same size and the same prowess when the question of honor is involved. The man who stops to think whether his opponent is larger than he is or stronger is lacking in the sense of honor with which men should defend themselves.

I do not take kindly to the term "leader in the Senate." The Senator who is led is lacking in appreciation of his duty as well as his right. This is a body of peers. I will go with any man in the investigation of intellectual thought and the determination of right and wrong. I will go with him and work with him intellectually beside him, but I do not want him to think that he is leading me. It might divert my mind.

Mr. President, I have here a very concise statement of the sheep and wool industry locally applied but of general application. It had been my intention to read it as a part of my remarks. With the permission of the Senate I will insert it as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BEAR LAKE COUNTY WOOLGROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
Montpelier, Idaho, June 16, 1911.

Hon. W. B. HEYBURN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The above association presents the following facts and respectfully implores you not to consent to any legislation inimical to our industry:

In the first place it costs a great deal of money to enter the sheep business. Most of us have paid, or promised to pay, from $5 to $6 apiece for our grade ewes. Some, who have bought pure-bred ewes, have paid from $15 to $25 each for them, besides which, all of us have been compelled to purchase pure-bred rams for from $15 to $50 each, to improve our flocks, as well as a first-class team of work horses, harness, sheep wagon, sleigh, several saddle horses, pack saddles, tents, guns, saddles, and camp equipages, etc., for both summer and winter use. Valuable property of this description, in the hands of the kind of men we are forced to hire, deteriorates very rapidly, for they seldom, if ever, take any interest in their work, or in the care of the herds, animals, or outfit intrusted to their charge.

You must be aware of the fact, that through the gradual settlement of the country, and especially since the arid-homestead law became operative, open range is becoming scarce, and bids fair to become scarcer every year, until the luckless sheepman in his almost desperation hardly knows where to find range for his flocks. All this forces him either to purchase outright or to hire from the State or private parties spring and fall grazing grounds. In the summer he tries to secure a permit to graze on some forest reserve, and sometimes is successful, or partially so. The forest-reserve policy of gradually cutting down every year the number of sheep that the sheepman may graze on a reserve is productive of much injury to the business. The applicant aims to keep from each fall to spring as many sheep as he has had on the reserve the previous summer. When spring comes he often gets a cut of from 10 to 25 per cent off his previous permit, and what to do with the animals included in such cut he does not know. He can not sell them at that time, for they are too thin and there are in most cases too few of them to make a herd alone. Experienced sheepmen have proved that the only profitable and practical way to run sheep is to run two ewe bands in the summer, cared for by two herders and one camp mover, merge the two herds in the fall, and either feed them hay or send the strong sheep to the Utah, Wyoming, or Nevada deserts during the winter, feeding the old ewes and thin lambs at home. The winter desert grazing method is a very risky and dangerous one, many sheepmen having lost the savings of a decade in one severe winter on the desert.

Our industry is now conducted in such a way that each sheepman must now own his own corrals for handling, separating, dipping, and shearing his sheep. In many cases a separate corral or inclosure must be built for each of these operations. Besides this, he is compelled either to hire from the settlers or from the State government land on which to lamb his flocks in the spring. During the last 10 years scores of sheepmen have been forced to purchase irrigated land on which to raise oats and hay for their sheep and horses, as the thin, old ewes and thin rams, wethers, and lambs can not go on the desert, but must stay at home and be fed hay and sometimes grain during the whole of the winter, as if they were thin when they went down on the desert, the chances are that they would either die on the way down or perish from exposure, which none but fat, hardy sheep can possibly endure or survive.

The high, almost extortionate rate—from 8 to 12 per cent per annum—of interest charged by every bank in the West is another very heavy incubus on this industry. Very often, and especially so during the last two years, sheepmen have been forced to mortgage all their real estate and chattel mortgage every sheep in their flocks to obtain money to conduct their business. During the last few years some banks, having chattle mortgages on the herds, have refused to allow sheepmen to risk their flocks on the winter range, and have also declined to lend them more money to buy hay. This has forced many a sheepman to either accept almost any offer for his sheep at home, or to put his whole herd—ewes, lambs, rams, everything—on the cars, ship them East, and dump them on a falling market for any obtainable price.

High wages, ranging from $50 to $75 per month and board and bedding, are paid to sheep herders. Camp movers (embryotic sheep herders) receive from $40 to $55 per month, including board and bedding. Boarding expenses would not be such a heavy tax if these men would be economical with their supplies, etc., for it costs many a sheepman much more to board two herders and one camp mover at the sheep camp than to feed his whole family at home. If it cost the sheepman as much per capita to feed his family at home as it does to feed his employees at their camps he would immediately call in a referee or receiver in bankruptcy. The vast majority of the sheepman's employees will not eat the class of food that their employer will and must. The old adage, "Put a beggar on horseback and he'll ride to the devil," receives one of its most truthful and forceful illustrations in their case. The herder who can not and will not purchase with his own means delicacies for his table at his own home refuses to work unless his employer procure them for him at the sheep camp. Two herders who boasted of having lived on $9 per month per man last winter refused to accept $15 (in lieu of board) per month per man this summer, even if free flour, mutton, and potatoes were also furnished them. In practically all cases the extravagance of the sheepmen's employees forces him and his family to endure a domestic economy that is almost parsimony. Almost all men employed by sheepmen must have the most expensive kind of food, no matter what it costs, no matter whether their employers can afford to furnish it or not, or they will not stay with him. Waste and carelessness and extravagance seem to characterize all their operations. If the sheepmen could obtain as good, reliable, and obedient help as the banks, stores, railroads, etc., they would be a happy class of men. It is a standing joke among the sheepmen in the West that when they want something good to eat they tell their wives, "Guess I'll go to the sheep camp to get a square meal." The high prices for camp supplies, in the shape of groceries, canned goods, etc., add very greatly to the cost of conducting this industry. This would not be so bad if their employees would be as careful as any prudent man should be with his employer's supplies and property, but as before said, waste, carelessness, and extravagance seem to be these men's rules, to which there is little if any exception. Concerning the irresponsible nature of the labor employed perforce by sheepmen it might be well to state an obvious fact, that many a sheepman is forced to employ a herder and trust him with tens of thousands of dollars' worth of property to whom he might and probably would refuse to lend a dollar were he not in his employ. This paradox is a fact. Perhaps the less said of this feature of the case the better for the sheepman's peace of mind, for this is the sheepman's greatest trouble. He does not complain of paying good wages to good men, but of the unfortunate and unprofitable fact that good wages, good board, good bedding, and good treatment will seldom obtain and retain good men. They will often leave him at a moment's notice with a herd or herds of sheep on his hands, when it is absolute cowardice and inhumanity for them to think of doing so. Of course there are occasionally some notable exceptions, but these only go to prove the truth of the rule.

During the last two or three years sheepmen have been compelled to pay the same prices for herding, lambing, camp moving, dipping, and shearing that prevailed when the industry was flourishing. Last spring a committee appointed by the National and State Woolgrowers' Association waited on a committee appointed by the sheepshearers' union and on account of the losses endured tried to induce the union to reduce the price of shearing at least 1 per cent per head. All the satisfaction the sheepmen's committee secured was a demand for the sheepmen to "come through" with the same old prices.

The high railroad freight rates, ranging from $2 to $3 per hundredweight, prevailing on wool from the intermountain region to the Atlantic coast adds very greatly to the cost of conducting this industry, and these prices prevail whether the wool nets the sheepmen 10 cents or 25 cents per pound. It may be well to state here that the transcontinental freight rate on wool from the Pacific to the Atlantic seaboard is considerable less than half the rate from the intermountain region—one-third of the way across the continent—to the Atlantic coast. Of course the fact that there is no competition, and the further fact that the sheepman must ship his wool to the eastern market on the railroad nearest to his shearing corral, causes this extortionate charge on the part of the railroads.

Cost of the forest-reserve fees and the regulations made by the Forest Bureau, while they may have been, and perhaps have been, of some assistance to some sheepmen, have likewise been a further tax to be added to the sheepman's expenses.

In this State—Idaho—the sheepmen have a 2-mile-limit law to contend with. This forces them to keep their sheep away at least 2 miles from any farm, ranch, town, fence, or sign of habitation, and the only way that the unfortunate sheepman can obtain any feed on the public land near a farm or ranch is by wearing out checkbooks in paying ranchers for the privilege. Besides this, some counties—Bear Lake, in particular—have made regulations through their commissioners creating "herd districts" on the public land of the United States, thus forcing the sheepmen, under fine and imprisonment penalties, to keep off such districts. In this county if the 2-mile-limit law were enforced strictly—which it would be if the sheepmen did not pay the ranchers for the privilege of herding sheep near their ranches—and if the herd-district laws were always strictly enforced, every sheepman would have to leave the county.

The sheepman is also forced to pay taxes in every county and State through which his herd passes. In some counties he occasionally obtains a rebate, but in most of such cases he is often forced to threaten to sue the county before he can obtain it. Not only is this the case, but by the way of piling Pelion upon Ossa, the poor, unfortunate sheepman is always compelled to pay full annual taxes for the whole year in every State through which his herd passes. Some winter on the deserts in Nevada, Utah, or Wyoming, lamb and shear on the trail north, and summer in Idaho or north Wyoming. The ubiquity of the tax collector and his deputies, so far as sheep is concerned, is proverbial. They seem to be omnipresence personified. Like the trusts, banks, and railroads, "they catch the sheepman coming, going, in between, and then some." Some members of the association, one in particular, have paid full yearly taxes during the last two years in the three different States—Idaho, Utah, and Nevada—and some have done the same in five different counties. The Idaho tax collector takes no official cognizance of a tax receipt from Utah. The Utah tax collector follows suit, and the Nevada tax collector, not wishing to be singular, thinks it is his duty to do as the others do and make the motion unanimous. The victim is only a sheepman, has few, if any, friends, and has money to throw away. The sheepman, unlike the professional tax dodger—the coupon cutter—can not evade his taxes. He can not, if he would, dodge or evade his taxes. His woolly friends are only too evident.

Another great outrage to him is the fact that railroads, railroad and private stock yards, commission houses, etc., charge about $200 to ship from the intermountain region, and market a car of sheep on the Missouri River. This must be paid whether the sheep net the price or not, and they must be sold on the day of their arrival, no matter how much they have shrunk in flesh, as they always do, on the way.

The slow speed of the stock cars, which have been known to take 10 days or more from Pocatello or Ogden to the Missouri River, makes the animals shrink considerably in flesh, and as sheep are always sold by weight at all the sheep markets, this takes away a very great deal more of the profit. Lots of sheepmen do not know their own stuff when they see it on the market, especially if they foolishly trust it to the herders or other help to accompany it to the market. It is a common thing for fruit trains to have the right of way East over sheep cars. One sheepman who owns a small orchard, as well as a few sheep, says that his pocketbook knows no difference between a loss from the shrink of his sheep or from the decomposition of his fruit. Everything seems to have the right of way over a sheep car. Many a sheepman has often seen his sheep car sidetracked that such perishable freight as coal, lumber, and gravel may not be hindered on the way. In fact, if the sheepman is wise and wants a good run to the eastern market he slips a little change to the yardmaster and gets his sheep cars put on a fruit train. He would like to get them attached to a faster than fruit train.

It is also a notorious fact that wool, one of the most important and valuable products of the sheep industry, has during the last two years declined about one-third in value. There was a time, a few years ago, when the wool and wether lambs from a herd would pay its annual expenses, but this is no longer true.

The prevailing and prospective uncertainty in the wool and mutton markets is very much worse for this industry than perhaps the actual withdrawal of the tariff on such things may be. Capital is proverbially very timid and will not invest where uncertain conditions prevail; and the uncertain conditions that prevailed last year are prevailing this season and threaten to continue during next year, have done the wool business almost irreparable and incalculable injury.

Many sheepmen in the West, commendably desiring to improve their flocks, have never purchased or bred anything but pure-bred rams. During the last few years the price of these animals, instead of decreasing as wool and mutton have done, seems to be and is increasing. The breeders of such stock plead when asked for cheaper prices, that very same excuse to the sheepman that he is pleading, viz, increased expenses, etc. It is impossible for the self-respecting sheepman to succeed in this business unless he improves his flocks by purchasing pure-bred sires. Not only is the first cost of these animals high, but they must be taken out of the ewe herd in the middle of the year and herded separately from that time till late in the fall or early winter, when their services are needed in the ewe band. This necessitates another herder, camp mover, camp outfit, and the heavy expenses incident thereto. The necessity for the high feeding of the rams during November and December every year adds very greatly to the fixed expense account.

To still further assist the sheepman in the road to bankruptcy court all the principal railroads in the West have recently raised the rates on rams in carload lots from the sheepman's ranch to the ewe band in the desert, where they are annually unloaded in December and put into the herd, and the same increased rates prevail when they are returned home in the middle of the winter. When the Oregon Short Line and the Southern Pacific Railroad officials were recently asked for the cause of the before-mentioned increased freight rates on rams in carload lots to and from the desert they replied that they had raised the rates because the Western Pacific had done so. Inquiry at the office of the Western Pacific elicited the response that the Western Pacific had raised rates because the Southern Pacific and O. S. L. R. R. had done the same. What a delightful instance of telepathy and induced unanimity of sentiment and action on the part of the railroad officials in their frantic efforts to assist the wealthy sheepman to become a multimillionaire! Such unselfish efforts ought to receive the attention and commendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The worst thing with which the sheepman has to contend is the class of help he is forced to employ, and the unfortunate fact that when he pays for good help he is seldom able to obtain it, but next to this great loss is the one sustained by predatory animals, viz, coyotes, wolves, mountain lions, bears, etc., and especially the ravages of the coyotes, which seem to be increasing annually. Most sheepmen think themselves lucky if they lose only 10 per cent of the ewes and lambs on the summer range. During the last two years poisonous weeds have grown up and multiplied on the range, and this spring scores and scores of sheep in every herd have been killed by them. The only feasible remedy for the loss by predatory animals seems to be that the Federal Government and the States afflicted by them shall all pay the same amount of bounty for such of their wild animals.

It is a notorious fact that the sheepmen have had heavy losses on the deserts during the last few winters, especially during the winter before last. One of the members of the association declares that during the last two years he has only met one sheepman who confessed that he had made any money, and he knows that he lied because he wintered near him on the desert, and the two herds lambed, sheared, and shipped mutton East together.

Last summer was acknowledged to be the driest season in the history of the intermountain region. Sheep came off the range thin. Lambs were small and thin in the fall, and, consequently, fetched low prices in the markets. Lots of sheepmen for the first time in their lives were forced to sell their ewe as well as their wether lambs. The true sheepman always tries to retain his ewe lambs because they are always better in quality than their dams, so that his herd may increase in value if not in numbers.

During the autumn of 1909 there was a species of venereal disease among the rams which cost sheepmen scores of thousands of dollars. It was impossible to put them in the ewe bands till late in the middle of the winter. This made the 1910 lambs smaller in the fall, thus depreciating their value. The disease was eradicated only by heroic and strenuous efforts, and the expenditure and loss of a great amount of money.

The cost of complying with Federal and State regulations made expressly for sheepmen is not inconsiderable, and while no true sheepman objects to these regulations, which he knows are made for his benefit, and which he is not only willing but anxious to comply with, not only for his own sake but for the sake of other herds and the community at large, still a further depleted bank balance is the result of such compliance.

During the last few years hay and grain for winter feeding have not only been high in price but scarce, and, consequently, difficult to obtain. Some sheepmen have paid as high as $20 per ton for hay. The average price has been from $5 to $8 per ton. The high prices prevailing for grain (from $2.50 to $3.50 per hundredweight) used by the sheepman's horses and the extortionate prices charged for supplies during the winter by the little stores in and around the edges of the desert, have added greatly to swell the expense account. To add to their trouble some sheepmen have been charged from $500 to $1,000 per herd for the privilege of obtaining winter grazing leases on land claimed by railroads and other companies. In many instances, these high prices charged by these companies, who have secured the alternate sections of land, have prevented sheepmen from using vacant Government lands, because the parties claiming these lands have refused to allow sheep herds to cross their lands in order to reach Government lands to which these people had no title.

One of the members of our executive committee has a cousin, Henry E. Horne, living at Old Castle, Leadville, New South Wales, who informed us that he can make good money by selling his wool for 6d. a pound and his lambs for 10s. each. He can borrow money from the Australian banks for only 5 per cent per annum, and rent at a nominal price tens of thousands of acres of good grazing grounds from the Australian Government. His lands being all fenced, he has few herders to employ. His principal labor expense is to keep up half of the fences around his inclosure. His neighbors keep up the other half. He obtains help for less money and at less expense than we can possibly do. He has no winter feeding to do, no expensive camp outfits to maintain, no hard winters to contend with, and his greatest expense is at shearing time. If, and when, the sheepmen of the United States have to meet such competition as this they may just as well order cars enough to take their whole herds to market, dump them on the same, accepting any obtainable price, use the money in part liquidation of their obligations, and trust to Providence to permit them to liquidate the rest at some future time. There are more sheep herds, farms, ranches, and homes owned by sheepmen under mortgage to-day than at any other time in the history of this industry. Many banks in Boise, Salt Lake City, Pocatello, and Ogden have from $5 to $6 invested in each sheepman's ewe belonging to their customers and debtors. What the end will be Omnipotence alone can tell. One fact is certain, that if there is much more tinkering with the wool tariff most sheepmen will and must gravitate back to sheep herding for their more fortunate sheepmen—the few who have purses long and well-filled enough to stand the financial strain. They will leave sheep owning and go back once more to sheep herding, but their loss will be their employer's gain, for there will then be a very much better class of labor in this industry than the United States has ever seen. The average man that we employ to-day is our bête noire. "If we praise him, he strikes us for a raise; and if we roast him, he jumps his job." He often dictates terms of both peace and war to his employer.

We do not like to bother you too much with this affair, but we deem it our duty to this industry, to our wives and children, and even to the whole country, to state these facts. We respectfully submit them for your consideration, and we implore you once more to do all that you possibly can to prevent any legislation inimical to this useful and indispensable industry.

The ridiculous and utterly indefensible idea that selling wool in the grease for 5 or even 10 cents less to the wool buyer will make woolen clothing any cheaper is the most laughable and ridiculous idea ever emanating from that most ridiculous of all sources—a Democratic brain. The value of the wool in a suit of clothes has and will cut very little ice in its value after the tailor, retailer, etc., get a whack at their customer. The retailer can always be depended on to care for himself. He always has a lot of specious excuses to offer in defense of his high prices. The duty was taken off hides, but who buys shoes any cheaper? And echo answers: "Who? Who?"

The Democratic policy spells dismay, disaster, and bankruptcy to the whole sheep industry of the United States. The American people are needing and will soon use all the mutton and wool that can possibly be raised in this country. The American sheepman ought to raise it. The American sheepman is unwilling and unable, however willing he might be, to meet competition from the South American or even from the Australian sheepman. In the Democratic policy the American sheepman sees his finish, but he will have the supreme satisfaction and consolation of dragging the Democratic Party down to defeat with him in November, 1912.

The poor, unfortunate American sheepman, bound, blinded, and tortured by his life-long enemies, the Democratic Philistines, may be, and evidently is, doomed to financial defeat, disaster, and death; but instead of being the sport of his enemies, he will, if and when he falls, pull down the already tottering pillars of the Democratic tariff temple and cause his enemies to perish politically with him not later than the next general election.

We are ready to answer any questions, and, if necessary, to send a sheepman thoroughly acquainted with the business and with these facts to meet you or any Senate committee at any time or place you may please to designate for the purpose of furnishing any and all further information in our power.

Believing and knowing that you will do all you can for us, and thanking you cordially for all your past efforts in our behalf, we have the honor to remain, sir,

Your most obedient servants,

L. B. LEVERICH, President.
J. G. CRANE, Clerk.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say that this table gives a very clear and succinct idea and statement as to the cost of every feature and phase of the sheep industry, and it is formulated by a man who is capable of doing it honestly and in a useful manner.

I desire, with reference to the cost and relation of the wool and the sheep, to read the following from the discussion of Mr.

Hagenbarth before the Committee on Finance. He was asked to give the relative value of the wool and the sheep. On page 34 he says:

The average value of mutton product per head, five years, is $2.0172.
The average value of the wool product per head for five years is $1.1494.
Giving for sheep a value of $3.1616.

I present that for the purpose of showing the relation between the value of the sheep and the wool.

Now, when you make wool unprofitable the sheep goes; the thing of greater value goes. As I said to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] yesterday, it can disappear almost entirely in a year or two, because men will not allow a profitless animal to occupy and graze upon their lands; they will try to do something else with it.

When you destroy the flocks of this country, as it will appear from an examination of the Statistical Abstract, it takes from five to seven years to reinstate them, because sheep are not grown overnight, and men must reaccumulate the land for pasture, and then the breeding stock, and then time must elapse until they multiply according to the rules of nature.

During all of that time you are at the mercy of the foreign market. You have destroyed your own source of production, and the foreigner has stepped in and supplanted you in the home market, and when conditions are revived under which you can engage in the business profitably you can not start out and say, "To-morrow morning I will start in the sheep business and begin to reap profits and benefits." You can say, "I will begin to get some land; I will begin to get some breeding sheep; and then I will wait until in the process of a few years we will be able to dispense with this foreigner who has come into our home market."

There is a little joker in this bill that is rather funny. There are 7,000,000 animals now grazing on the forest reserves. The General Government itself will be out of a customer for the grass that grows on the reserves, because those animals will just as surely disappear from the forest reserves as from any other part of the country when it is not profitable to raise them. Then I suppose the Government will have to look for some wild animals with which to stock the forest reserves. I do not know what they will substitute for those sheep.

Mr. President, the question is worthy of a fuller discussion or consideration, but, as the Bible says, "Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone." That seems to be the condition here, and the Ephraims are those who are going to support this measure.

Just take our own State. I now have a report which is reliable. The total of the sheep now on the range in Idaho is valued at $10,000,000—I give the round figures, but the sum is much more—and the average value of a sheep is $6.30. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] seemed to express some surprise that the number of sheep had not continued to grow. He had not taken into consideration the fact that there was a standard beyond which it is not necessary to grow. The ranges are full; the industry is at flood tide; yet the other day when this free-wool bill came in from the House of Representatives wool dropped 4 cents a pound. How can Congress, a great dignified body, play the child and stick its finger into the machinery of a delicate clock or watch and giggle while it does it and wreck the beauty of the mechanism? That is what they are doing when they introduce this bill to revise or reduce the duties on wool. They are as ignorant of the effect of their act as is the child who projects its finger into the machinery, because it does not happen to grow under their feet or around their doors. They know about the thing that represents their bread and butter to them or their luxury or comfort, but they are impatient with the man who lives, perchance, a few miles away and seeks the exercise of his right and his duty here to present the interests of those people, and they say, "Oh, we are not interested in those people; they live out in the woods; they live on the frontier."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. In criticizing the lack of knowledge on the part of those who have taken up the wool matter, I fear the Senator from Idaho has lost sight of the wonderful evidence of their thorough familiarity with the subject, which was indicated by the dictionary which they attached to their report. Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. HEYBURN. Who did that?

Mr. CLAPP. Presumably the committee; but I do not know.

Mr. HEYBURN. What committee? Let us have it so definite that the man who reads this record in the future will never be in doubt.

Mr. CLAPP. Has the Senator a copy of it?

Mr. SMOOT. It was the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Ways and Means Committee of what?

Mr. SMOOT. Of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HEYBURN. And they attached the dictionary to the report? I have read that. I do not object to being funny sometimes, but I do not want to be that funny.

Mr. CLAPP. In the light of that dictionary, can the Senator from Idaho question the familiarity of those gentlemen with the subject?

Mr. HEYBURN. I could, but the Senator from Minnesota having anticipated me, having explained it, I shall not engage in that.

The impatience, however, that is shown by those who do not happen to know the difference between a sheep and a goat, when men presume to stand here and do their duty, is shown by the fact that they go away. They come back occasionally when they are sent for. They think, however, we ought to vote. There is a class of men who think that when they have spoken all has been said, and that after that any conversation is superfluous. We have had some instances of it, where a man would stand up and declaim long and loud and eloquently and beautifully and sit down and draw a long breath and say, "Now vote; that is all there is to be said."

Mr. President, I hope that during this leisurely hour some Senator may be induced to inquire whether or not he is entirely sure that he is pursuing the right path. I am not going to argue with the Democrats; I never converted a Democrat in my life; I talk to them; they attend meetings where I speak, and they greet me gracefully and pleasantly, but I never suspected that I converted one of them. Let them be Democrats; let them so vote. If they should vote the Republican ticket I should lose confidence in them. [Laughter.] But when I talk to Republicans I have a right to demand, I have a right to plead with them, I have a right to urge upon them their duty. It is a right which exists and belongs to every one of us. We have no right to go into a controversy of this kind with our minds closed against change. Otherwise we might as well vote immediately upon the reading of the bill or the report on it.

Mr. President, I am looking not so much to to-day because to-day is mortgaged; this political hour is mortgaged to the verge of bankruptcy, but I am looking to the future. Some Senators will stand on this floor some day in sackcloth and ashes, because they will stand discredited as loyal members of a great party that represents a great principle. They may not confess it. I have been through several of these political cyclones, but I never went to the cyclone cellar. I stood out, and I felt the winds and saw the waves and buffeted them. I saw in the State where I live a condition that may have existed elsewhere, but I doubt it, where it was charged that we would not be given the right or the opportunity to vote for the Republican candidate for President because there should be no election. I sat in a convention under the threat that it would be captured; but we had policemen at the doors, and those who went in had a card with the chairman's name on it as evidence of their right of admission. That convention nominated an electoral ticket, and they nominated a ticket which represented Republican principles untainted by any hyphen. They only cast about 7,600 votes for that ticket out of a great many thousand, but those 7,600 votes were the leaven of the loaf, and that loaf rose from that day until we gave a Republican candidate for President 30,000 majority out of less than 80,000 votes. I am looking forward to those conditions, but they will not arise in my State if I can help it. I do not intend to temporize or compromise. I intend to support the nominee of the Republican Party, and I intend to promise on his behalf that the Republicans of the United States—the more than 7,000,000 of them—will send to the Congress of the United States a Republican majority that will enact laws along Republican lines and in conformity with Republican principles.

I am going to promise that from the rostrum wherever I speak for the nominee of the Republican convention, let him be who he may, I am not going outside of the house and throw stones at the windows because, forsooth, the fire has gone out. I am going to stay in that house, and I am going to live there in comfort, if I can, but I am going to submit myself to whatever discomforts may come and keep on repairing the house. That is my idea of being a Republican.

Now, to my friend from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]—and I say it in all consideration—does it not seem a little like throwing stones at our own mansion to be throwing this free-wool bill and free-list bill at the Democrats? They like it; they just seize it with the avidity that a fish would seize the bait, because it is in their direction. They believe in those principles, and you are not hurting them any. It reminds me of the man who tried to freeze a dog to death by holding him at the northeast corner of the house in the nighttime. You can not choke the Democrats by throwing free trade at them, but you may choke yourselves. That is what I mean by saying to the Senator, I am not going to throw stones at the windows of our house in order that they may get in.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Idaho directed his remarks to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. In kindness.

Mr. McCUMBER. In kindness always, I know. I might suggest to the Senator that the Republican mansion is built in harmony, in symmetry, and in justice, and the moment that you displace the relationship of one part of that structure to another, that moment you are producing an inharmony, and the only thing that is left us to do is to harmonize other parts as much as we can. The Republican party stands for protection, and it stands for protection so applied that the benefits, so far as the protective idea is concerned, will be made as nearly equal and in as near a line of exact justice to all industries concerned as possible. That has been disarranged. I will stay with the Senator in the house. I purpose to support the Republican nominee; I purpose at all times to be a Republican. The Senator has known that I have stood as such in the storm, and in very bitter storm, and I am able to do it again.

I may disagree with the Senator as to just exactly what shall be my attitude as to changing one schedule to conform to another schedule that has already been changed, and still with him maintain the same high regard for the Republican Party. I simply maintain that, when you have put everything on the free list which the farmer produces, there is no injustice in attempting to harmonize some of the things which the farmer buys upon the idea of a closer conformity with the prices at which he sells.

I agree with the Senator absolutely in that I will stand for the same proposition that he does to get a plank in the Republican platform that the next Republican nominee must stand on, demanding equal protection to all of the industries of the country; and I will take my chances upon that being the policy of the next administration. But in the little matter of how to remedy conditions in our house at the present time we may differ as to how far we may go.

I want to say to the Senator that I have not indicated my views upon the particular matter of which he has been speaking, and that is the wool schedule, and possibly he misapprehends my position upon that subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I intended to be entirely impersonal; but I am free to admit that I did look at and direct my remarks to the Senator from North Dakota, in a measure, yet in a very impersonal measure. It was rather to point a principle than in the way of attack.

The Senator speaks about a little thing. This little weapon that is to be hurled into the ranks of Democracy will be a boomerang. It has the curve in it, and it will come sailing back and strike Republican protection on the head, and it will not skin a single Democrat. [Laughter.] You want to be very careful what weapon you take up. You must first know how to use the weapon and be quite sure that the other man is not more skillful in its use than you are.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I heard several Senators approve of the Senator's suggestion that this will be a boomerang that will come back and strike the head of the Republican Party. I want to suggest to some of the Senators that when they have violated the fundamental principle of Republicanism in striking down one of the great industries of this country there will be something perhaps other than the head only of the Republican Party left for the boomerang to react on.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, Mr. President. Imagine carrying such a policy forward in the Alamo, with a lot of men fighting an enemy on the outside and needing every life and every arm that was inside the wall, getting into a quarrel among themselves and killing half of their number—that strikes me as being about the proposition—and then undertaking to continue their defense with the remaining number. No; that will not do. You can not win any contest in life in that way. You may feel like it; we all have those impulses sometimes to strike close at home, but the wise man does not do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. When there is a mutiny in the ranks of the Army what is the first duty of the commander?

Mr. BAILEY. To surrender.

Mr. McCUMBER. To surrender or to take care of the mutiny, and then, after he has disposed of that, to go ahead upon his original lines of battle?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I intended that my remarks should be directed against the formation of a mutiny. I do not believe that the discontent in the Republican Party has gone so far as to be incapable or impossible of adjustment and correction—not by yielding Republican principles, but by pointing out to those who think they have a grievance the fact that they also have an enemy. They have a grievance, and they have a common enemy at the same time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator not agree with me that a certain portion of Republican Senators are to-day, by their votes upon the reciprocity agreement, attacking the citadel of Republican policy?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but they are a minority.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; I want to deal with that minority.

Mr. HEYBURN. If we do not succeed in teaching the minority of Republicans in the Senate that they are making a mistake, the Republicans of the country will do so, and they will never forget that they have been so taught.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I should be glad to hear the Senator from Idaho inform us how we can educate the leader of our party, the head of our party, and bring him back into the true Republican lines of protection?

Mr. HEYBURN. Who is the leader and head of the party? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if this does not indicate a mutiny in the Republican Party, I do not know how to describe one.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see——

Mr. BAILEY. There is a debate as to who is the real leader.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Following the debate on yesterday as to the real principles of the Democratic Party.

Mr. BAILEY. How can an army win a battle while it is disputing as to who its general is?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, generals have gone down in battle, and armies have selected other generals who led them to victory.

Mr. BAILEY. But you do not know whom to select.

Mr. HEYBURN. There will be a coming together of the Republicans, and they will know whom to select. This is not the first time that internal dissension has caused us to enter into a house cleaning. We have succeeded heretofore.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The beauty of it seems to be that the meeting is between reactionaries.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, "reactionary" is a nice word; it is a very fine word to conjure with in the newspapers. They use it. The man they do not like is "a reactionary." There is no such thing as a reactionary in politics; there is none in this body at least, although there may be some outside. I am not going to be diverted by the calling of names—"reactionary." I have stood in the ranks and fought with the Republicans—that is, alongside of them, not against them—all my life. I was born before the Republican Party existed. My first teachings and my first impulses were in the direction of the principles of the Republican Party. I have never abandoned them for a moment. I have seen men abandon them to the regret of their lives. I remember in 1872 or 1873 one of the foremost men in the State in which I lived coming to my father, who was always a staunch Republican, and he said, "John, we have got to leave the old Republican Party and go with this new movement. It represents progression; it represents a lot of other things that are fashionable now." My father said, "John"—this was Forney, of the Philadelphia Press—"it is easier to leave a party than it is to get back into it. I will stay in the Republican Party, and if you come back and knock at the door in a spirit of true repentance some day I will admit you." He never came back. The same was true of Andrew G. Curtin. I heard him argue with my father in regard to going out of the Republican Party, and he got the same answer. He went out; but, like Forney, he never came back. Gov. Curtin came to the House of Representatives as a Democrat, and the only way he knew he was a Democrat was that he saw a "D" after his name in the Congressional Directory. [Laughter.] Poor Forney died of a broken heart because he did not get to the United States Senate.

No; these are not new questions. There is a fundamental principle behind both great political parties. One is right and the other is wrong; but no Republican can find any excuse on earth for supporting this Canadian reciprocity bill or any amendment that is offered to it that would justify his action in my eyes or that will justify his action in his own eyes 10 years from now; and the man who does not see 10 years ahead in his political life is not a wise man or a safe man. You want to be very sure that you are going to be able to vote for yourself 10 years hence or stay away from the election.

You are going to strip this country of one of its great industries. There is no more doubt about that than there is that the sun will rise and set on the day in which you do this infamous thing. There is no personal element in what I say. It is an infamous thing because of the result that flows from it. You are going to strip the country of its clothing and take chances on some foreigner clothing you; you are going to be a beggar at the door of some other nation for clothes to wear; and they will charge you what they please and place the burdens that suit them upon the mercy that they grant you. That is what you are going to do. Would you rather be clothed by France or Spain or Mexico or Australia than by your neighbor, whose flocks graze under your vision and in the green fields that are your benefit as well as his? That is the question. Do you choose, rather, that some other Government shall make the laws under which your commodities are furnished you than that you make them yourselves? What will you say to the laborer when you take away his employment? When I say "laborer" I include all men in this country, for I do not legislate for the loafer; he simply creeps under the tent. The American people are a laboring people in the various vocations and walks of life, and the same right and consideration runs to all of them from Congress. Are you going to say to the people because, forsooth, some community with which you happen to be better acquainted will not be affected by this bill, that you have no further interest in it?

What are you going to substitute for these industries when you turn men away from their employment, in the lumber industry, for instance? One of the largest industries in the United States is that of lumber. The largest amount of wages paid is that in the lumber business, and yet you shut them out, and you say "We will not buy lumber of our own citizens; we will buy lumber of the foreigner, and we will be subject to the laws that the foreigners make in reference to its production and its sale," and you turn those millions of your workmen loose. Where are they to go? Will they go down into the fields of the South and say to you, "We are American citizens; we are hungry; we want an opportunity not to beg, but to work." What will you say to them? You will say, "Where have you been working?" They will answer, "We have been working in the great forests of this country to make the lumber to be used to protect the people and build up their civilization." You will ask them, "Why did you leave there?" And they will reply, "Because you voted me away. You said to me by your vote you shall not any longer labor in this field; we will allow the foreigner to do what you are doing, and you take your chances." Does that not appeal to men who are charged with the responsibility of creating equal opportunities, not for all the people of the earth, but equal opportunities for our own people. The legislator who would stand here in this body and legislate for equal opportunities for all the people of the earth with our own people should be subject to the recall. If there is any one case on earth where I would support the recall, it would be in that contingency.

Just think of it, a man, lacking an intelligent comprehension of the purpose and the principles of our Government, thinking that we must take into consideration the people of other countries when we legislate to control the industries of our own people! Such a man has no place here. We are a family Government. Our first duty is to the people of this country.

I have heard it said here that the line north of us, between this country and Canada, is a dim one, a geographical line, and various kinds of a line, always minimized. It should be the best marked line of any boundary of the United States, because there is more reason for it. It is easier of crossing by the man who would encroach upon us, who would come into our country and take our markets and contribute not even the duty of citizenship, not even the duty of bearing arms in defense of our country, of paying taxes to support it. The man who would come across this line that is boasted to be an indefinite line is the most dangerous man that you could admit. We can see a ship land at our seaports. We keep an eye on our southern boundary line. But here to the north a man may walk across the line with a hundred thousand dollars' worth of dutiable goods in his pocket. Is there any other line upon which vigilance is so necessary and so justified as upon that line?

And yet, I repeat, they minimize it as an argument why we should disregard its existence. Yes; they call it an imaginary line. I have seen men and heard them in this country to whom patriotism was an imaginary principle. But they are not the men in whose hands we can place the tiller ropes. The only argument that has been advanced in favor of it is that somebody wants it.

I have said many times that if there was any argument that would compel me to vote against a man who wanted an office it was the argument that he wanted it. Of course, that is the foundation principle—I hesitate to diverge—of the direct primary, where the man runs after the office and no office runs after the man, and the only reason he ever puts forward is: "I want it and I am willing to pay the admission fee. How much is it?" That is all there is of it. He is required to pay an admission fee in that kind of politics.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. I am very much interested in hearing an orthodox Republican speech made here in these days, but the suggestion of the man paying the entrance fee in the primary recalls to my mind that there have been elections recently in this country where there was a pretty heavy fee paid not under the primary system.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is very likely. I do not know anything about it. But all the direct primary laws require what one might call an "ante," and your name can not go on the ticket without it; your name does not receive consideration until you have paid it up.

Mr. President, we are being confronted with that kind of an argument here. We are told that somebody demands it. Why, great heavens, the United States Senate stands appalled before the statement that "you will take that bill and you will not alter it. Do you see?" That is the spirit in which it comes in here. "You will not amend it." The Senate of the United States, invested with the power of legislation and the duty of conscientious and separate action, are told, "You will take that bill as we give it to you, and you will not amend it. If you do, we will wreak vengeance on you. We will keep you here during the hot weather. We will do anything else that we can to you." And the Senate cringes and bends its knee before that edict.

I would look closer into a measure that came with that challenge, because of the challenge. I would suspect the intelligence and the motive of the power that would assume to exercise that control over the Senate individually or collectively.

The Senate of the United States, whose proud boast it is that it is the highest legislative body in the world, submit to a dictation of that kind from anyone on earth! And to submit to it from some one who has no legislative power, some one who by the conscience of law and government is bidden to keep his hands off the coordinate branches of the Government!

Has the day come when men in this body fear to disregard the dictation of anyone? For fear of what? The Senator who has anything to fear should go into counsel with his conscience.

Mr. President, while this may seem apart from the wool schedule, it is the very heart and soul of it, because it comes here wrapped in the flag of the pirate. It comes here discredited by the threat against the right of the free exercise of the duties of the high office that rest upon us. It is not too late in this hour, Republicans, this hour, to repudiate any dictation as to how and when we shall legislate in the performance of our duty. Let us get out from under this spell. It is like a deadly cloud which seems to have fallen upon Republicans. They are affrighted. Stand up and proclaim not only the right of action, but the determination to act! Did ever such a measure come before Congress in the history of this country—and I have gone back since these debates commenced for the purpose of investigating the question—did such a measure ever come into Congress and pass without any amendment?

Why is it? Is the spirit of empire rising up over the people to dominate them? Have the days when the people dared speak for themselves in their own councils gone by? We are the people. There is no voice of the people but that of the Congress. The people must either speak through Congress or they are dumb. Laws originate here, under the Constitution. They are formulated and finally determined upon here, and there is no other tribunal on earth authorized to make laws for the people of the United States. It is the spirit of self-government, and when we forget it the people's rights are in danger. Whenever the time comes when any man or set of men or coterie of men can state a line of action to be followed by Congress without controversy, then Congress has fallen from her high position to one that courts—I was going to use a harsher word—discredit.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator says that Congress has fallen in that——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not. I said "if."

Mr. CLAPP. I will say if. I am in complete sympathy with the Senator, but I want to ask him if he does not go farther than that, and in that equation alone from which there can come representation to the various sections of this country. If this condition is to continue, would he not go a step farther and say that the country had fallen?

Mr. HEYBURN. That day will never come.

Mr. CLAPP. It will come unless we enter and maintain a protest against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; 90,000,000 people with the right to govern themselves will govern themselves right.

Mr. CLAPP. Then there will have to be some sort of a change, for those 90,000,000 people are to-day interested in this very legislation and powerless to meet the dictation that comes from one single source.

I am in complete accord with the Senator from Idaho. I believe the time has come when Congress, not for the sake of Congress, not for the sake of the dignity of the Senate alone, but for the dignity of the American people, should enter not only an emphatic protest, but a protest that means something against this policy that is growing up in regard to these matters.

I am in thorough accord with the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. The time has come for Republicans—Republicans who believe in the principles, for the principles are greater than the party; the party is only a crystallization of them—the time has come for Republicans who believe in the principles of the party to lay aside factional differences and march under one flag, to vote down this measure, and every amendment to it except the amendment that throws it out of Congress. That time has arrived, and the question is, Has the man arrived? The hour is here, and I am calling out for the man. The man who does not do it is in front of the wheels of the Juggernaut.

Mr. CLAPP. For one, I am in favor of doing it. But the Senator had reached a point which I think is vital, and that was the fact that Congress is gradually surrendering its power of initiative in legislation, gradually yielding to a condition where legislation can come in here with the dictation that there shall be no change and no amendment. In sympathy with that suggestion of the Senator I rose to suggest that not only do we owe it to ourselves, but in a broader sense to the country, to protest in a manner, and the Senator suggests a manner very aptly. It would be for Republicans, as Republicans, under the banner of Republicanism, which is known to every member of the Republican Party, to stand here with reference to this legislation independent of any outside dictation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Stand here to vote this bill out of existence, because there are men enough here who call themselves Republicans to do it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Stand here and vote down every amendment that is proposed to it, because every amendment here is a splinter off the Republican flagstaff. These are only splinters that you see flying about, chipping in here, chipping in there. Let us keep that——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, instead of the flagstaff being splintered, the flagstaff has been broken down, the flag has been lowered, and there is no splintered flagstaff, to refrain from further splintering.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will bet 7,000,000 Republican votes what the Senator says is not true.

Mr. CLAPP. Then does the Senator believe that the passage of the Canadian tariff bill leaves flying the Republican standard, the Republican flag, the Republican policy? The Senator does not understand my position in this respect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I do.

Mr. CLAPP. When this bill passes the flag has come down.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the flag has not come down.

Mr. CLAPP. The mast has been broken.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have seen ships come in with their bulwarks shattered and splintered, and I have seen them come in with cracks in their sides, but the old flag was up at the mast.

Mr. CLAPP. But if the ship had gone down in mid-ocean——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is an "if."

Mr. CLAPP. Our ship has gone down.

Mr. HEYBURN. The only men who could think that the Republican ship has gone down are on that side of the aisle. No man on this side has a right to think it. The very concession that is embodied in that suggestion is one outside of the rights of the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I merely wanted to observe that even Republicans who agree with each other become embroiled.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yesterday we spent a delightful day. It was equal to being up on the coast of Maine or somewhere else. We sat here and basked in the sunshine and watched the Democrats rend each other. The Republicans are not going to rend each other. They are going to come back to the old fold of protection that protects without any fine lines of discrimination as to just how much above high tide it is. We are going to come back to that. When I say that I mean the Republicans. I do not undertake to speak for what is called the organization. Organizations are momentary, but Republicanism is eternal, and the people will stand ready to correct the mistakes of those who have proven to be failures as their representatives.

Mr. BAILEY. That is very good so far as it goes. But who is authorized to define Republicanism?

Mr. HEYBURN. Every Republican; and I am one of them.

Mr. BAILEY. Each for himself.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am authorized to speak for the great body of the American people with which I have been associated for a lifetime. I know them. I can tell a Republican when I hear him speak. If I can not do it by sight, I know him when he speaks. He may look like a Republican and open his mouth and seem like a Democrat.

Mr. BAILEY. I have myself thought that it is easier to distinguish a Republican by his voice than it is by his vote in this time. I read the record for a definition of a man's party affiliation rather than listen to his voice. The Senator from Idaho, when the roll is called, will find his party voting according to a split almost into two equal parts. I would like to know which is the Republican Party.

Mr. HEYBURN. The majority in this body is the Republican part in this body; the majority of those who sit on this side, and those who do not belong to the majority are probably on the mourners' bench, or will be there.

Mr. BAILEY. Are they Republicans? That is what I want to know. I want to know how to treat them.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Republican Party in this body is represented by those who stand for Republican principles, and they are so old that they need no branding.

Mr. BAILEY. But that is so general that a dull man can not comprehend it. What I want to know is if the majority are the real Republicans, what are the minority?

Mr. HEYBURN. What are the minority?

Mr. BAILEY. Are they apostates?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are mavericks, and the Senator knows exactly what a maverick is. It awaits branding.

Mr. BAILEY. It is an unbranded yearling, and if the Senator wants to call his associates that, he has my full permission to do it.

Mr. HEYBURN. They will either brand themselves or be branded, and then the Senator will know exactly to whom they belong.

Mr. BAILEY. If they could be rounded up in the White House lot I know how they would be branded.

Mr. HEYBURN. They will not be branded by anyone.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the way they do with mavericks——

Mr. HEYBURN. They do not wind them up in anybody's lot particularly. They will find them up at the end of a rope.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not say "wind." I said "round." The Senator must employ the cattle vernacular when he starts that way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the cattle vernacular pretty well. I learned it a long time ago.

Mr. President, I had intended to talk to the Members of this body who sit on this side of the Chamber. It has been said, "You can not do any good. You can not accomplish anything." I am not willing to believe that. I am not willing to believe that men are going to determinedly and deliberately attack the principles in which they believe in the hope that they will make some measure so unpopular that it will die. I do not believe it. I do not want to believe it. I want to see these men here with whom we have served so long under the banner of the Republican Party, which is always over this side of the Senate, come back to their senses and their reason.

Mr. NELSON. You mean those who are in favor of reciprocity?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I mean I want to see them all come back and disregard these madnesses which seem to have come upon the people, and come back to us and say, "We will have nothing to do with this kind of legislation; it is not representative of the Republican Party's principles or the principles of Republicans." That is what they ought to do. Do it if you sacrifice the impulse of the hour; do it because of the sentiments that have directed you in your lives in the years gone by and made you Republicans.

It is so easy for a little difference to make a big disturbance. Waive the little difference. Wait until four years from now, when the body at the other end of the Capitol will be as overwhelmingly Republican as it is now overwhelmingly Democratic; and it will be. There is not the slightest question about it. With that force and sentiment behind you, you can bring the old Republicans together. Let them throw off these progressiveisms, as they call it. They progress like a crab. You can not tell which way they are going.

If I should stand here as long as my strength would permit and the patience of the Senate would permit and feel that I had sown a seed in the mind of any man who ought to be a Republican, which seed would germinate and grow and bring him back again, I would be willing to stand here until I was ready to drop. It is a very serious proposition. When I see that men who have been termed "war horses" are willing to be led away, with the hand of the enemy of Republicanism on the bit, it appalls me, and it will appall the sturdy, strong Republicans in this country, and they will strike like lightning when they strike and they will destroy those who forgot how to be Republicans.

It seems to me that there have been so many fancies and foibles in politics recently that men in the Republican Party have forgotten the necessity of avoiding temptation, tempted off by this and that fancy. They may be meritorious and may be good, and were they presented with the deliberation and the patience and the determination by which men accomplish great things you might be able to secure recognition for them. But the trouble is, because the whole world will not fall down on its face in worship of the new idea, you immediately abandon the world. That is the trouble. You say, "I want quick action. I have got a new idea—a new thought here. No man ever entertained it before. It is grand. I want you to adopt it, and I do not want you to take time to think about it." That is the trouble in this political age; and we have in this body and we have in the organization of the party throughout the country these factions which represent just that principle. Come in with the ideas, but be patient with the party. Be patient with the majority. Do not quarrel with the majority immediately. Be patient with it, and if there is merit in your cause it will receive recognition at a proper time.

But if we were to undertake to change the faith, to change the policy of the Republican Party as often and as rapidly as is demanded by some, we would be continually afflicted with a political cold from sudden change. I wonder if the Republicans and those who call themselves Republicans are going to stand out stubbornly and wreck a part of the people of this country, in violation of the pledge that they and their ancestors made to preserve the people. Who ever heard of the Republican Party advocating free wool? Who ever heard of the Republican Party advocating a revision of the tariff by schedules? In 1894 they wrote an express declaration in their platform condemning it. "We condemn in unqualified terms the proposed policy of the Democratic Party to revise the tariff by schedules."

You might as well attempt to build a chimney from the top as to make an intelligent revision of the tariff by schedules. One door would be closed before you were permitted to look into the room adjoining it and know what was going to be there. Yet I find here that whatever your declarations may be, that is what you are doing. You are proposing to revise the last tariff in separate schedules. You are revising the farmers' free list—God save the mark—by schedule. You are proposing to revise the cotton schedule separately, and demanding that each of them shall be a closed book before the other is opened. That is Republicanism, is it?

If I had an idea that I had slept with and lived with all my life and believed in as I believe in my God, I would not sacrifice the Republican Party for it. I would not take chances on that unharmony which results from insisting that no other man shall think but you.

Mr. President, I am loath to leave this question feeling, as I do, the helplessness of this hour. I feel like a man who in the waning hours of the night looks upon the face of his friend who will pass away before he sees him again. It is not the deathbed of the Republican Party, but it will be the deathbed of a lot of men who think they are Republicans. It will be their deathbed, because when the millions of loyal and true Republicans rise up it will be such a political cyclone as will sweep them like the dust into the Democratic Party, and the Democratic Party will treat them as the dust as it walks about among them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to occupy the attention of the Senate a very few minutes in presenting a matter that has a practical bearing upon the amendments that the Senator from Texas proposes to offer relating to the wool schedule of the Payne-Aldrich law.

It will be remembered that on yesterday during the most entertaining speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] the question arose as to the number and value of sheep in the United States, covering a period of years. A portion of the table was put in the RECORD, but I desire to place in the RECORD a table covering the last 25 years, which shows the number and value of sheep in the United States, during each one of those years, as taken from Statistical Abstract of 1910.

Mr. President, I will not stop to read the figures, but will ask that they be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection that will be done.

The table referred to is as follows:

January 1—	Sheep.
	Number.	Value.
1886	48,322,331	$92,443,867
1887	44,759,314	89,872,839
1888	44,544,755	89,279,926
1889	42,599,079	90,640,369
1890	44,336,072	100,659,761
1891	43,421,136	108,397,447
1892	44,938,365	116,121,290
1893	47,273,553	125,909,264
1894	45,048,017	89,186,110
1895	42,294,064	66,685,767
1896	38,298,783	65,167,735
1897	36,818,643	67,020,942
1898	37,656,960	92,721,133
1899	39,114,453	107,697,530
1900	41,883,065	122,665,913
1901	59,756,718	178,072,476
1902	62,039,091	164,446,091
1903	63,964,876	168,315,750
1904	51,630,144	133,530,099
1905	45,170,423	127,331,850
1906	50,631,619	179,056,144
1907	53,240,282	204,210,129
1908	54,631,000	211,736,000
1909	56,084,000	192,632,000
1910	57,216,000	233,664,000

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be observed that there are more sheep in the United States to-day than in any year of the period covered by the table, except the years 1902 and 1903; but the value of the sheep to-day is in excess of the values of either of those years to the amount of about $65,000,000. The value of sheep to-day is $25,853,871 in excess of the value of any other year since 1886, and more than three times the value of the year 1897. In 1900 the number of sheep in the country was 41,883,055, and their value was $122,655,913. In 1910 the number of sheep was 57,216,000, an increase of 5,332,945 in 10 years, and the value in 1910 was $233,064,000, an increase in 10 years of $110,408,087.

Now, let us compare the year 1909 with the year 1910. The Senator from Mississippi suggested that we were making very slow progress in the sheep industry of this country. A comparison of the year 1909 with the year 1910 shows that in 1909 we had 56,084,000 sheep, and in 1910 we had 57,216,000, an increase of 1,132,000, or over 20 per cent.

The value of sheep in 1909 was $192,622,000, and in 1910 the value was $233,064,000, an increase of $40,442,000 in a single year, or a trifle over 20 per cent.

In 1900 the number of sheep in the country was 41,883,055, and their value was $122,655,913.

In 1910 the number of sheep was 57,216,000, an increase of 5,332,945 in 10 years. The value in 1910 is $232,064,000, an increase in 10 years of over $110,000,000, an increase of over 90 per cent. This showing is certainly a very gratifying one.

Mr. President, the table I have submitted is worthy of careful study by the Senate at the present time. The fact is that the sheep industry has progressed as rapidly as could have been expected. There was a period from 1893 to 1898 when there was a great depression in the industry, and there have been other years when the number of sheep has somewhat decreased, but in no instance from 1886 to the present time has there been a year when the value has not increased over the value of the preceding year.

It is a remarkable circumstance that the value of our flocks has increased enormously, it being now three times that of the year 1897, and the increase for 1910 over 1909 was, as I have suggested, over $40,000,000, and the number of sheep has been correspondingly increased.

Mr. President, it may be that the wool schedule needs revision to some extent, but I appeal to my Republican associates to be extremely careful in this matter and not legislate in a way which will seriously cripple this great industry, which is giving employment to so many persons and supplying high wages to the men on our sheep ranches and also to the operatives in our woolen mills.

It is an indisputable fact that during the period of the Wilson tariff law—and I will not say that the depression was entirely consequent upon the passage of that law, although I believe that to have been the chief cause—the woolen industry all over this country was greatly depressed. In New England a very large proportion of our woolen mills were closed, the operatives were thrown out of employment, and that was equally true of other sections of our country.

It is also a fact, Mr. President, that immediately upon the accession of the Republican Party to power in 1896 and the enactment of a tariff law which gave adequate protection to the men who raise sheep and the manufacturing establishments which convert wool into cloth there was a wonderful development of that industry and an employment of laboring men to an extent that was very gratifying to those of us who believe in the doctrine of protection.

Mr. President, my only desire was to put in the RECORD the exact figures, so that Senators may examine them and in legislating on this subject, whether it be at this session or next year, the question as to the revision of the rates of duty on raw wool and on the manufactures of wool can be intelligently discussed.

I have suggested, Mr. President, and I suggest it again for the benefit of the Senator from Mississippi, that I do not say there ought not to be some reduction in the duty on some grades of woolen goods. I am willing to take that matter into very careful consideration at the proper time, but I do appeal to my Republican associates and to my Democratic friends as well not to legislate carelessly on this question or to do anything that will destroy an industry which is of so much moment to the happiness and prosperity of the people of this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am through, Mr. President, and will be glad to listen to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody in the United States could be more delighted than I to hear that even the Senator from New Hampshire is willing to revise the woolen schedule somewhat downward. I want to follow that admission upon his part by a question, Is he willing to reduce the duty upon wool to any extent at all?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not even say that I was willing to revise the duty on woolen goods downward. I said that I was willing to take the matter into very careful consideration, and if the arguments persuaded me that a downward revision to some extent ought to be made, I would not stand in the way so far as the duty on wool is concerned. I am not competent to speak of that until I give it further investigation and consideration.

I do know that I am not in favor of the removal of the duty entirely from wool, which the Democratic Party made in 1894, and which resulted in such disaster to the sheep industry of the country.

Whether or not the duty on raw wool will stand something of a reduction is a matter that I will likewise give consideration to, but I am not prepared to-day to give an opinion as to what my exact action will be on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the answer of the Senator from New Hampshire to my inquiry justifies the old exclamation, "What a delusive thing is human hope."

Just a moment ago I thought I had gathered, and I felt rejoiced to my inner heart, the idea that even the Senator from New Hampshire was willing to revise the woolen schedule downward. I jumped to the conclusion that in that he meant to revise it downward it seems, but it now appears that he would regard an expression about revising the tariff a good deal like the authors of the late Payne-Aldrich bill, as a pledge to revise it upward.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is not——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps I have been a bit unfair, and I will try to make it a fair statement. If what I have said be incorrect, then maybe this addendum will cure it. The Senator, as the leader of the majority upon that side of the Chamber, has either not had the opportunity or else has not had the willingness to come to a conclusion as to whether he would revise upward or revise downward. Now, I hope I have made the statement fair.

Mr. GALLINGER. First, let the Senator from New Hampshire disclaim any leadership on this side of the Chamber. He has never asked for it; it never has been bestowed upon him, so far as he knows, and he would not accept it if it was tendered in that form. He is simply a private in the ranks, a believer in the doctrine of protection, and with his Republican associates will, when this question of the tariff comes before this body seriously—because I do not think it is seriously before this body at the present time—be heard on the question in defense of the views that he holds on this and all other tariff duties.

Now, let me say to the Senator that I had no purpose of suggesting that I would be in favor of reducing the duties upward. I would not accept any such suggestion as that; but I will say to the Senator that there may be some items in the wool schedule that ought to be somewhat reduced and others that ought not to be reduced. I have not given the matter that careful consideration which I shall want to give it before voting on the different items. I think likewise that that may be true as to the cotton schedule. But I have looked upon this tariff discussion as a meaningless thing during the present session of Congress.

Nobody believes we are going to pass a tariff bill. Nobody believes seriously, I take it, that the amendments submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] on the wool schedule are going to be crystallized into law at this session of Congress. But I apprehend that if the Senator from Mississippi and I both live until next year, and we both continue as Members of this honorable body, we will have a real tariff discussion, and we will very likely have legislation on the subject of the tariff. When that time comes I shall discharge my duty as best I can, and if I am persuaded, as I may be, that some of the duties in the Payne-Aldrich bill are too high, I shall not hesitate to vote to lower them. But I have no expectation that I will ever be able to bring myself to support any tariff bill that will commend itself to the Senator from Mississippi, who is, by and large, a free trader.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not be deflected into a discussion as to whether the Senator from Mississippi is "by and large, a free trader" or not. I think we have finally arrived at this blind alley, to wit: That the Senator's response to my question may well be classed with the usual Washington departmental response to letters: "Yours of a certain date received and will receive due consideration at the proper time." And that was about all I expected from the Senator from New Hampshire.

Now, if I have made a mistake in designating the Senator from New Hampshire as the leader, the floor leader, of the Republican Party in this branch of the Federal Legislature, it has been a mistake that I have gathered from conversation about me and from the public prints. I had the idea that he had been elected chairman of the Republican steering committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not correct, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought that that was true. Then I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire, who is now chairman of the Republican steering committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee that is ordinarily called the steering committee of the Senate has for its chairman the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I was elected chairman of the committee on committees, but I never had the presumption to think that that made me the leader of the Republican side of the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I meant by that was the committee on committees; and in my ignorance as a new Member of this body I thought it was the custom to select the man for that place who was to be regarded as the party floor leader. This conclusion I arrived at from a knowledge of the traditions and customs of the Senate. My apology is made fully and my regrets are expressed sincerely, modified by the gratification of learning that the place is occupied by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], whom we all revere and regard very highly. I asked the Senator from New Hampshire the question whether he would be willing to reduce the duties upon wool, because I am of the opinion, right or wrong, that the duties hitherto fixed upon wool have not been high enough and protective enough either to bring about or to promise in any definite future an increase of the wool production in the United States equal to the constantly increasing demand for wool and for woolens. I wanted to know whether the Senator, for himself, let us say, and not for his party, would go further upon the high road of protectionism, as he logically must from that standpoint, and increase the duties so that there might be a home sufficiency of the supply, or whether he would desert the logic of protectionism under those circumstances, and, in obedience to a very general popular demand, reduce the duties somewhat, and if any, how much.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question, and then I shall not disturb my friend from New Hampshire—no; I do not mean that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator never disturbs me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not mean that. I understand that no question could possibly "disturb" either the set and fixed opinions or the equanimity of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I meant simply that I would not further take up his time. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator began, but I heard him say that he had put certain tables into the RECORD. I think I gathered that he said he had put in a table showing the value of sheep.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and their number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The table of numbers I put in the RECORD myself yesterday.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator did so on yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And stated my reasons for putting in the tables showing the numbers rather than the so-called table of value.

What I wanted to ask the Senator was whether, when he used the phrase "a table of the values of sheep," he meant a table of the prices of sheep?

Mr. GALLINGER. I meant exactly what the Statistical Abstract gives, the number of sheep and the value of the sheep.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the number of sheep multiplied by the market price of sheep.

Mr. GALLINGER. The aggregate number of sheep and the aggregate value of the sheep.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire to state, as near as he can, how much of that total market value—that is, the aggregate price of sheep—is due to the value of the sheep unaided by legislation, and how much of it is a factor in the price added by tariff legislation to the natural value—that is, the value which the same number of sheep would have had independently of governmental interference in restricting the supply by taxation?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am asking that question for information, because I should like to have it from a friend of the system. I should like really to know. Of course you say you are putting on a duty to encourage the industry, and the only way to encourage the industry is to raise the price. Now, I should like to have the Senator state for my information and for the information of the country how much of this so-called value is due to the tariff—what percentage or what aggregate amount, I care not how the Senator states it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is asking a question that it is impossible for anyone to answer offhand. I will simply say to the Senator that under the protective policy sheep have increased in number every year since 1899.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have increased 19 per cent in 14 years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, they have increased very much more than that in the last 25 years; but even if that be so, the Senator will be interested to learn that in the last year they have increased 1,132,000 in number. That is doing pretty well. The value during that year has increased $40,442,500.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I desire to get at. How much of that so-called value is the natural value of the sheep in a free, unhampered market, and how much is added by legislation to their price?

Mr. GALLINGER. My judgment is that in a free and unhampered market there would not be any value; the sheep would be practically extinguished. The Senator knows, if we had free wool, that within, say, 10 years the flocks of sheep in this country would practically be annihilated. Does he not know that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not attribute to me such a very remarkable, radical, and unreasonable opinion as that. I do not think people will quit eating mutton or quit wearing woolen goods, and I do not think the demand for either wool or for mutton will cease because of the reduced rates of a tariff bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Mississippi is right about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Moreover, I am thoroughly aware of the fact, and so is the Senator from New Hampshire, that the sheep industry in Great Britain, a thoroughly free-trade market, has not been extinguished. I am willing to admit that, of course, there will not be as high a price for sheep, that there will not be the same encouragement to the sheep herder, but that he will have just such encouragement and just such success as is due to his industry, to his intelligence, to the character of his pastures, to the caliber and the industry of his labor, and to such other natural factors as enter into the problem, including the conflict between demand and supply; but with wool upon the free list, of course, the sheep raiser would have no governmental encouragement, and there would be no governmentally added price to the price at which he could sell his sheep to the less-favored citizens of the Republic. I hope, however, the Senator from New Hampshire does not desire to attribute to me the idea that by withdrawing protection people would quit eating mutton or quit wearing woolen goods——

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that the sheep industry of the United States would therefore be "extinguished."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no such purpose as that in mind. I think, however, people would be eating Australian and Argentine mutton and wearing clothes made out of Argentine and Australian wool. That is my judgment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are doing that now to some extent, are they not?

Mr. GALLINGER. To some extent, yes; but I do not want to increase it. The Senator from Mississippi tells us, and we believe that he always speaks sincerely——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I try to; but few men succeed in doing that always—heat of argument, excitement, and bias, all considered, I try.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that he practices intellectual honesty. He tells us that, and we believe it; but does the Senator from Mississippi believe that we can raise sheep and manufacture woolen goods in open competition with Argentina and Australia and continue to pay the wages that we are now paying in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think we can, but we can not raise so many sheep upon as poor pastures as we do now, and upon as high-priced land, but we shall raise sheep all the same, and we shall raise them and sell them in competition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is exactly the same problem that arises now and then as to a duty in connection with a manufacturing plant. There is no doubt about the fact that when you reduce the duty and bring on a sharper competition by bringing on an increased importation the unfit, the men without foresight, the men without the requisite intelligence, the men who will not advantage themselves by all improved methods must go out of business, and the business will be carried on upon the principle of the survival of the fittest. The very trouble with protection is that it encourages and maintains in business the thriftless and unintelligent and those who have not provided themselves with the latest and most effective machinery and the latest and most effective labor—the highest priced and therefore cheapest labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not intend to go into that. I was merely trying to get an answer to these questions. I have tried to give it from my standpoint, but I want it from your standpoint. Paul said he was a Pharisee of the Pharisees before his conversion. By the way, I made a mistake about Paul the other day. I had the buck ague so badly in speaking to "grave and reverend seigniors" that I spoke of the light that Paul saw on his way to Tarsus, actually getting the place whence Paul came mixed up with the place whither he was wending his way——

Mr. GALLINGER. I observed that slip of the tongue on the part of the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I meant Saul of Tarsus on his way to Damascus. But it is said that Paul was "a Pharisee of the Pharisees," and I regard the Senator from New Hampshire as a protectionist of protectionists, a Republican of Republicans, and chief in the Sanhedrin, in so far as strength of faith goes, at any rate, though he disclaims leadership.

Now, desiring an answer from that sort of a man, I should like to have, if you can not give me an estimate, a guess upon your part of how much of the so-called value—that is, the price—of sheep in the United States is due to the natural conditions of demand and supply and how much of it is due to the legislative interference of the Congress of the United States through the fixing of a tariff duty.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I said a moment ago, Mr. President, I do not think there is any man on either side of this Chamber wise enough, without very diligent and exhaustive investigation, to give the Senator an answer to his question. The Senator knows that it is very easy to ask a question that can not be answered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that. A child——

Mr. GALLINGER. That the tariff does cut some figure in the price of wool and the price of sheep goes without the saying.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A child, I know, can ask questions that a philosopher can not answer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; everybody admits that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And maybe I am filling that rôle to some extent; but in the figures which the Senator from New Hampshire has given I think he will find that the number of sheep increased about 19 or 20 per cent and the value of sheep—that is, their selling price—increased about what per cent? I think it was more than 200 per cent, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The value of the sheep in 1910 was $233,664,000, as against $192,000,000 in 1909, and $211,000,000 in 1908, and $204,000,000 in 1907, and $179,000,000 in 1906. It has been a fluctuating value. The tariff has not kept——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the increase by percentage, I will ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has his pencil in hand?

Mr. GALLINGER. In what years?

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the year 1896 to 1910.

Mr. GALLINGER. In numbers or value?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In value.

Mr. GALLINGER. In 1896 the value of the sheep in the United States was $65,000,000, and in 1910 $233,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, that is an increase——

Mr. GALLINGER. And, in round numbers, the number of sheep in 1896 was 38,000,000 and in 1910 57,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The increase in value has been pretty nearly 300 per cent, has it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; more than that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. More than 300 per cent?

Mr. GALLINGER. Between three and four hundred per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and an increase in numbers of about what? Twenty per cent?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; more than that. About 50 per cent. From 38,000,000 in 1896 to 57,000,000 in 1910.

Mr. SMOOT. Just 50 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The difference is 19,000,000, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Call it in round numbers 50 per cent. The number of sheep, according to that statement, has increased 50 per cent, and the market price, the selling price, the so-called statistical value, has increased over 300 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that be true, then the tariff has made the price of sheep increase about six times as fast as the number of sheep.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is where the Senator and I part company. Does the Senator think that the high price of everything in England and in every other country in the world, as well as in the United States, has been due to tariff legislation? The Senator knows that there has been an enormous increase in prices all along the line and all over the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; I do not say that is the only cause.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I am calling attention now to the fact that the value has increased over 300 per cent and the number has increased not 50 per cent

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; just 50 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that, therefore, the so-called value has increased six times to where the number has increased one-half.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator very likely is aware of the fact—and if he is not I will call his attention to it—that the quality of sheep in the West has vastly improved since 1896, and the value of individual sheep is much greater now than then.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That has a great deal to do with another branch of this question, which we can not go into now.

Mr. GALLINGER. The tariff is surely not responsible for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has a great deal to do with what I was trying to call attention to a moment ago—that a certain sort of sheep industry would continue where there was a certain kind of sheep on certain kinds of pasture, with certain kinds of attention, although on the commonest and least attended to sheep the industry might go out of existence. Of course the Senator from New Hampshire is right in saying that the present enormous increase in market prices of most commodities, not in America alone, but all over the world, is not altogether due to the tariff laws of any particular country. It is very largely due to the annual increase of the output of gold, and it is very largely not an increase of value, but an increase of exchangeable price as expressed in terms of money. Things swapped against one another have changed in not nearly the same proportion as those swapped against money. But this gross discrepancy which we find in sheep is far above and beyond the average or index of increased prices. But what I am trying to arrive at is this, and I am trying to get it from the Senator because I want both sides as near as I can get it. I want to get as near as I can to the Senator's idea of how much of the so-called value or the aggregate selling price of American sheep is owing to natural causes outside of the tariff and how much is owing to the tariff. Of course, I understand that he can not make an absolutely mathematical accurate calculation.

Mr. DIXON and Mr. WARREN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will allow both Senators to get in in my time in a moment, because this is an interesting matter. I will simply say, once more, in reply to the Senator, that it is an utter impossibility to answer the Senator's question categorically or intelligently——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or approximately even?

Mr. GALLINGER. Or even approximately, offhand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can not make even a reasonable guess at it?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I would not be willing to make a guess of any kind. I think that I would not do myself credit in making a guess. I know it is very much less than the Senator from Mississippi imagines it to be, but that it may have some bearing on the price is probably true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator from New Hampshire means that he thinks that the present protective duties have benefited the sheep herder very much less than the Senator from Mississippi thinks they have?

Mr. GALLINGER. As affecting the sheep herders, yes; I am inclined to think that is so. One other thing that I want to say is this: There has been the wildest anxiety on the other side of the Chamber to help the poor farmer out. They are not helping him out in passing the reciprocity bill; they are doing him a great injury; but in addition to supporting that measure our Democratic friends are tumbling over each other to support a so-called farmers' free-list bill to help the poor farmer out. I think we are helping the poor farmer out pretty well when we are increasing the value of his flocks in this country in a single year, as we have done from 1909 to 1910, over $40,000,000. I want the farmers to have that benefit. I would rather the sheep raisers—and they are all farmers—would get $233,000,000 for their sheep at the present time than $92,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, I would ask the Senator from New Hampshire this question, What proportion does the sheep-raising agricultural industry of the United States bear to the entire agricultural industry of the United States?

Mr. GALLINGER. That, again, I am unable to answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator from New Hampshire has just asserted that this amount of money gained by the sheep herder was gained "by all the farmers" of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not say that. It was gained by the sheep herders and their employees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if it be true that the sheep-herding branch of agricultural industry forms a very small percentage of the total agricultural industry, then the statement that the Senator has just made, or the assumption that he has just taken, whichever it may be, is necessarily unsound, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all; and I will add to that this suggestion, that, even though the sheep herders are a small part of the agricultural population of this country, the so-called reciprocity bill, which the Senator from Mississippi is advocating with so much impetuosity, covers practically all the agricultural interests of the United States, and you propose to put all their interests under free trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that, and do not know it now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is not squaring himself——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that. I did not know that the reciprocity bill put all agricultural articles on the free list.

Mr. GALLINGER. It comes pretty near it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that it even put wool there.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not; but the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know it put, oh, a hundred articles——

Mr. GALLINGER. It comes pretty near putting all the agricultural articles——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In fact, I had an idea that the total value of the crops put upon the free list in our trade with Canada alone and not with the balance of the world would not make over one-tenth of the total agricultural production of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. In that suggestion the Senator is wrong; and I presume the Senator includes cotton in his calculation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and I include corn, and I include sugar, and I include rice, and I include a great many other things; and I think, although I have not made the calculation, that the total value of the entire production of the several articles which are touched by the reciprocity bill and put upon the free list will not constitute much, if any, over one-tenth of the total aggregate production and value of the entire agricultural interests of the United States. And especially when the Senator remembers, as the Senator will remember with his usual clear business sense, that the Canadian reciprocity bill permits even those articles made free by it to come free from only one country in the world, and that a very small one.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been discussed by Senators better qualified to discuss it than I. I am simply going to add the suggestion—I did not make a speech, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi; he will observe that I am not making speeches these days—that I simply put into the RECORD some figures from official sources, and I expressed the hope that Senators would give them careful examination. They may serve as texts for future discussions between the Senator from Mississippi and some of the rest of us.

I am not vain enough to believe that my position is always right. I am not foolish enough to contend that the position of the Senator from Mississippi is always wrong. We have different views, and it is well that we have. We develop thought by friction and attrition, and these discussions are to my mind very valuable, even by way of suggestion, and I hope that next year we will have a free field to discuss all these questions.

I wish that we might stop now in these discussions and vote on the three bills that are before the Senate and adjourn and go home. That is what I should like to do. I am very tired of the heat of Washington and I am not being greatly enlightened by the discussions which are going on in the Senate, although they are entertaining. But they cover matters that we are all thinking about more or less, and at some time in the future will be very seriously considered in this body, no doubt, when we have a tariff bill, which I suppose we will have next year if we live until that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not share the pessimism of the Senator from New Hampshire. I have not yet reached the conclusion, if I ever reach it at all I would reach it very reluctantly, that the Democratic side of this Chamber added to those on the Republican side who profess a desire to revise the tariff downward, especially in connection with the woolen schedule, will be compelled to go home with the adjournment of this Congress without having accomplished any purpose and without having reduced any taxes that are now in my opinion bearing oppressively upon the people. If I thought with the Senator from New Hampshire I would agree with him that we ought to vote at once upon the several things that he has in his mind, whatever they are, and go on home. In fact if I agreed with him fully I think it would be wise to vote on reciprocity and go on home and leave the balance of it alone.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would suit me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I do not agree with the Senator. I have hope yet. I have hope in that recently budded and still, I hope, budding conversion of individual Republicans here and there from the high-protectionist platform to a reasonable protectionist platform. Even if I can not get what I want, I shall feel very proud indeed if this Congress shall adjourn with a few laws upon the statute books which, if even protectionist in their character, are yet not so highly protectionist as the duties now standing are. I have hope of that.

Of course, I have no hope that the Senator from New Hampshire and I will cooperate along those lines any more than I would have any hope, if a Democratic majority was here, that he would join me in any vote expressing my ideas. My hope is that the progressives—the Senators who are called by their opponents the "insurgents," though I can not for the life of me find what they are insurging against; I have been unable to locate the elective leadership of the Republican Party upon the floor, and therefore have been unable to find out what particular authority they were insurging against—I have hope that these so-called insurgents may insurge to the extent of bringing about some legislative enactment in the way of revising some tariff duties downward in the interest of the people whom they peculiarly and above all other public men claim to represent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is not pessimism on my part; it is hope and expectation. I hope that we will have no tariff legislation at this session, and I do not expect we will have any tariff legislation at this session. I do expect that during the next session of Congress we will have presented to us a Democratic bill revising the rates of duties in the so-called Payne-Aldrich law. When that bill comes here we will then discuss it, and I promise the Senator from Mississippi that in that discussion, if I shall be here, I will try to be as sincere and careful in my consideration of the questions involved as the Senator from Mississippi will be, however widely we may differ.

I do not believe the Senator from Mississippi desires to destroy the industries of the United States, but the Senator has been educated in a school of political economy the application of whose principles would have a very disastrous result upon the industries of our country.

The Senator has been in the habit of telling interesting little stories during our debates that we have all liked to listen to. I want to tell a little story, because it was an actual happening. We had a Democratic family in New Hampshire who for more than half a century had been engaged in the woolen industry. They were most excellent people and made most excellent goods. They voted the Democratic ticket with great regularity and were potential in their community as leading and influential Democrats.

When the Wilson tariff law was passed and wool was placed on the free list those manufacturers, in common with some Republican woolen manufacturers in my State, believed that it was to be a great boon to their industry, and a workman was instructed to hoist a ladder on the front of that factory and paint over the front door the words: "In God we trust; Cleveland and free wool."

In about six months that factory closed. The workmen were out of employment. The fires were out, the smoke ceased to ascend from the chimneys, and the blinds were drawn. That same workman, taking the same ladder and the same paint brush, went up and rubbed out that motto and inscribed instead these words: "In God we trusted. In Cleveland we busted."

Mr. President, that is exactly what happened to the woolen industry of New England, and it was approximately what happened to the wool-producing industry of the Western States.

Mr. WARREN. The people of the West did not have money enough to paint a sign.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wyoming says that the people in the West did not have money enough to paint a sign. But we had. That sign was actually painted, and that good family—and they were most estimable men—have been voting the Republican ticket ever since. They got enough of free wool to last them for a lifetime.

Mr. President, what I want above all things else is that when this impending Democratic legislation is inflicted upon this country, if it ever shall be, it will at least be conservative enough to save something out of the wreck that will necessarily come to the manufacturing industries of the United States.

I have not any question as to what will happen if the views of the Senator from Mississippi shall prevail. The Senator may think differently and does think differently, but the lessons of history and of experience have taught me that I am nearer right on this subject than is the Senator from Mississippi. But time will tell, and I am willing to wait.

Mr. DIXON. I wanted to interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire in his very interesting dialogue with the Senator from Mississippi regarding the effect of the tariff on wool and sheep. I heard the table read showing the increase of 300 per cent in the value of the sheep in the United States between 1910 and 1896. During that time that they had increased about 19,000,000; in other words from 38,000,000 in 1896 to 57,000,000 in 1910. Undoubtedly the great increase both in numbers and in value was fundamentally due to the tariff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has not the Senator the figures wrong? What were the figures in 1896?

Mr. DIXON. About 38,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator said 28,000,000. The Senator is right.

Mr. DIXON. Yes; after the full effect of free wool under the Wilson tariff bill had gone into force.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is an increase of 19,000,000, is it not, instead of 28,000,000?

Mr. DIXON. Nineteen million, I said—from 38,000,000 to 57,000,000.

But I want to say this to the Senator from Mississippi. I really think there is more widespread and honest misinformation about the wool tariff, the keystone of protection, as has been reiterated in the papers from time to time, than any other one thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. The woolen rates.

Mr. DIXON. The woolen rates. Now, to-day I do not believe my friend the Senator from Mississippi knows, as a matter of fact, the small difference between the price of raw wool in this country, in the Boston market, and in the London market. If I were to ask my friend from Mississippi what was the tariff on raw wool, what would he say?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The tariff on raw wool, unwashed, is 11 cents a pound.

Mr. DIXON. Eleven cents a pound on unwashed wool?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from Mississippi know that for the past six months there has not been to exceed 2 cents a pound difference between the price of raw wool in the United States and in London? Where does the other 9 cents of the tariff go?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi did not know that; and if that be true, then it proves that the whole policy of putting this protective duty on wool has failed for at least six months in its evident purpose.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A duty of 11 cent on unwashed wool, by the admission of the Senator from Montana, has raised the price of American wool in the home market only 2 cents. It has brought about a difference between the home price and the price of wool in the markets of the world of only 2 cents. It necessarily follows, therefore, if that be true—I do not mean if it be true as a fact, but I mean if it be a statement which can be relied upon, not a mere temporary condition owing to some outside cause, but as a permanent condition to furnish a basis of sound argument—if it be true that fixing a duty of 11 cents on unwashed wool, which amounts to 44 cents on washed wool——

Mr. DIXON. Thirty-three cents on washed wool.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; 44 cents, by protectionist estimate—has increased the price of American wool in the American market only 2 cents, then it follows with absolute mathematical and irresistible certainty that putting wool on the free list and taking off every cent of the 11 cents per pound duty could not decrease the price of wool in the American market more than 2 cents, because all it has raised it is 2 cents.

Now, you can take your choice—either your tariff act has had the effect which you purposed, to make the price of wool approximately as much higher than it would have otherwise been as the duty itself, or else it has failed and has made it only 2 cents higher. If the first proposition be true, then removing the duty will reduce the price 11 cents, untaxing the ultimate consumer to that extent; and if your second statement be true, then reducing the duty can reduce the price only 2 cents, and costing the sheep raiser in price only 2 cents.

Mr. DIXON. Now, has the Senator stated his proposition? Then, by the same rule of logic and reasoning, the Senator from Mississippi, as an honest man, is forced to say that the tariff on wool does not add to the cost of wool the measure of the tariff on wool. Does the Senator agree to that, if this statement be true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Montana has just made that statement himself.

Mr. DIXON. Yes. Then, by the same logic, the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Montana made the statement, not I. I have not seen the figures.

Mr. SMOOT. They are true as to to-day's quotations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If they are true——

Mr. DIXON. They are true. The Senator will take my word for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it be true that the tariff of 11 cents a pound has raised the price only 2 cents a pound, then the removal of that tariff can reduce the price only 2 cents a pound and can hurt the sheep raiser only 2 cents per pound, or else it is a temporary condition due to some other disturbing cause and therefore not a fair basis for tariff argument. So that on one horn of the dilemma or the other the Senator from Montana has impaled himself.

Mr. DIXON. Now——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If——

Mr. DIXON. I yield for a question and a statement, but I do not want the Senator to make a full speech without giving me a chance to get in a word edgewise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think we will be here until September, and you will have an opportunity to get in plenty of words.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator has not answered my question.

The whole argument here of the Senator from Mississippi yesterday was that the tariff always enhanced the value of the American article the full measure of the tariff duty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; no Democrat has ever taken that position since the world began.

Mr. DIXON. Then I wholly misunderstood the interesting argument of the Senator from Mississippi for an hour yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The position that has been taken has been this, and nothing else: That under the tariff shelter the home producer gets as near the tariff fixed level of price as he possibly can and approximates it in nine cases out of ten. But he never gets precisely and exactly——

Mr. DIXON. Then why has not wool——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because there are a thousand other factors besides the tariff which may enter into the question of price. The argument is good only when other things are all equal and the tariff alone operates.

Mr. DIXON. Why has not wool sold 11 cents higher here than in the London market if the American article has added to it here the full measure of the American tariff? Why does it not add 5½ cents if it added even 50 per cent of the tariff measure? I want to tell the Senator from Mississippi, and I think I know something about the actual working of the wool tariff, why the difference is. My State of Montana, I believe, raises more sheep and more wool than any other State in the Union.

Mr. WARREN. Except Wyoming.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Wyoming excepts Wyoming. I admit it is a neck-and-neck race, but I think the cold, actual figures will give Montana a little nose ahead in the race.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that it would be true for the last two years, but we are clearly in advance now in both numbers.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator from Mississippi will follow me, I say to him that notwithstanding there is a paper academic tariff on wool of 11 cents per pound in the grease, there has not been on an average—I want to get inside the line of safety—3 cents a pound difference between the London and Boston market within the last six months.

I will tell you what the matter is. The American woolen mills have not been running over two-thirds time.

Mr. SMOOT. Forty to 60 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. From 40 to 60 per cent.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wyoming say from 40 to 60 per cent under normal production. But when you hear men on this floor and newspaper editorials talk about the tariff on raw wool increasing the cost of clothing to the man who knows the actual condition it is a joke. There is not a suit of clothes in this Chamber on any Senator's back where the wool tariff to-day and for the last six months has made 15 cents difference in a suit. It has made a tremendous difference to the wool men of the West. About 500,000 people in this country are directly and indirectly interested in the growing of sheep and wool and mutton. I saw sheep in my State under the influence of the Wilson tariff bill of 1893 sell for 6 bits a head.

Mr. SMOOT. And the owners were glad to get rid of them.

Mr. DIXON. Translated into down-east English, that means 75 cents.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Cotton sold that year at 6 cents a pound, too. Yet there was no duty on cotton and no duty removed from cotton at the time.

Mr. DIXON. That is true. The Senator from New Hampshire recited the instance of his Democratic friend who ran the woolen mill there. That terrible nightmare which settled over the West during that 4-year period converted not one man, but literally converted them by the thousands in my State. The secretary of the Montana Woolgrowers' Association used to be a Texas Democrat. He is now the most rantankerous protectionist I know of. He faced bankruptcy and ruin during that 4-year period. It has softened and steadied the price of wool and mutton and sheep. It has not had the full percentage, as shown by the figures, with the great increase in the coinage of gold in this country and in the world during the past 15-year period, as I have attempted to show.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By your own confession you added only 2 cents——

Mr. DIXON. Undoubtedly; but the yardstick of the gold dollar was the unit of value.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By your own confession there has been added only 2 cents to the price of wool.

Mr. DIXON. No; for the six months' period.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator confesses he has picked out a period which is not fairly representative, and therefore could not be the basis of a fair argument.

Mr. DIXON. I am not stating that that has been the average difference in price. I say for the past six months' period that fact has existed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the reason of the existence of that condition of affairs is the agitation that is going on for free wool.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, pshaw!

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to him, whether he knows it or not, or whether he may say "pshaw" or not, that a woolen man who buys his wool to-day can not immediately transform it into goods and get his money, as in the case of buying and selling merchandise. He has to make the wool into goods, a long and tedious process, then find a market for it, and he has to give four months' time after dating his bill ahead. He can not afford to buy wool in a protected market, with the likelihood of having a free-wool market in the near future.

The same principle applied in 1896 before free wool, under the Wilson bill, was repealed. In 1896 nearly everybody expected the bill to be repealed and the price of wool advanced. Why? Because they knew just as soon as a tariff was placed on wool the price would advance, and they know to-day that if the tariff is taken off the price will be lower; and no manufacturer is going to take any chances unless he buys just as close as possible to a free-trade basis.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. DIXON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi to finish his statement and then to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One Republican Senator has just attempted to prove that a tariff duty of 11 cents per pound on wool has robbed the American consumer of only 2 cents a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana did not say that. The Senator from Montana said within the last six months.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Montana did say that taking the last six months the difference in the price of wool here and in the London market is 2 cents a pound, and he used it as the basis of his argument——

Mr. DIXON. To show why——

Mr. WILLIAMS. To disprove the Democratic contention that the duty does approximately measure the higher price of the article in the American market.

Mr. DIXON. That is exactly what I used it for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to my way of phrasing, it was the measure of robbery that the raiser was capable of perpetrating upon the consumer. That is merely my phraseology. But after one Republican Senator is through with that another Republican Senator—the Senator from Utah—steps to the front and says the first Republican Senator has taken an absolutely unfair basis, because the last six months have been totally exceptional, owing, according to the Senator from Utah, to Democratic "agitation" for the removal of the duty on wool. Now, in the name of common sense, both of you take one shoot or one of you get out of the argument; it does not make any difference which.

Now, one word more——

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You can not take as the basis of fact for an argument an exceptional period. If you take it for a fair argument, you take a fair period. If it be exceptional and it is due to the fact that the people who have been robbed to the tune of 11 cents a pound raised their voices to such an extent that the robbery has been reduced to 2 cents, then the "agitation" has benefited the American people and the American consumer to the extent of 9 cents a pound.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I must answer the Senator from Mississippi. I say to the Senator from Mississippi, not as a Republican Senator representing one theory of financial system to a Democratic Senator, but as one gentleman to another, there is no doubt but that the threatened reduction in the wool tariff has to-day cost the woolgrowers of this country literally millions of dollars. I have sent for a telegram which came to my office this morning. If the young man reaches me in time I will read it to the Senator from Mississippi. It is from one of the sheep growers at Billings, Mont. He says the price of wool under this continued threatened agitation has fallen to the terrible times of 1893. The wool market has literally been paralyzed under the threat of the House bill, which promises only about 2½ cents per pound on wool.

Any man who will take the patience to honestly investigate the conditions will find that what I am now saying is the absolute truth. The very threat of the passage of that bill by the House has cost the woolmen of this country literally millions of dollars in the past 60 days.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, when the Senator from Montana makes a gentleman's statement to a gentleman of a fact I receive it, but you can not make a statement of that character about an inference, about a supposed cause. When the Senator states to me that wool has gone down to a certain price and is at a certain price, I accept his statement, but when he goes further and assures me as a gentleman that the reason for it is this or that——

Mr. DIXON. The Senator draws the line on reason.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then he transcends the lines of possible information given. I have as good a right to draw a conclusion as to the cause as the Senator has. But I am not quarreling about that. I am quarreling about this: That you now say the reason of the fact that the tariff of 11 cents made only a difference of 2 cents is that there was agitation. A moment ago you were using that six months' period as a basis of your argument that 11 cents duty did not raise the price of the home market approximately to the tariff level.

Mr. DIXON. I think I can convince the Senator from Mississippi of that fact. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi frankly that under the operations of the Dingley tariff on wool, carried through into the Payne bill, there has been nominally 11 cents duty, but there has not been that much protection to the woolgrower. The average man—and I say this not in any egotistical spirit—the average man does not take the time—the average Senator does not do it—to investigate the real conditions surrounding the duty on free wool.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. Just one minute.

Mr. REED. Right there on that question——

Mr. DIXON. All right; I will yield at this point.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that the difference in price is not represented by the tariff; that the difference does not approximate the tariff. How much did the tariff raise the price of wool per pound?

Mr. DIXON. Answering the Senator from Missouri in a perfect spirit of frankness, I would say to him it is impossible to determine that exactly. I saw wool sell in my State in 1895, under the terrible depression of the time, as low as 8 cents per pound. The Senator from Utah says he saw it.

Mr. SMOOT. I bought a million pounds at 6 cents a pound.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Utah says he bought a million pounds at 6 cents a pound. The actual condition was that the wool men were simply bankrupt and ruined. No man will dispute that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. There was very widespread devastation through that whole tier of the country. The corn farmers in Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Minnesota, and Indiana, where the sheep are fed, only raise the sheep for the market; they are carried in great train loads down to the cornfields of Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, and Illinois, and there corn fed for the Chicago market.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. They suffered almost as severely as the sheepmen themselves when the great market was destroyed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana is aware that the Senator from Missouri desires to interrupt him.

Mr. DIXON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I asked the Senator for a frank answer. He has been asserting with great force that the tariff did not increase the price of wool——

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no, no.

Mr. REED. To the amount of the tariff.

Mr. DIXON. Yes; I think it has not.

Mr. REED. He has asserted that at the present time it increases it only 2 cents a pound. Now, it seems to be admitted, or at least stated, by the Senator that this is an exceptional time. If the Senator can be specific as to the amount the price is increased and can assert it to be 2 cents a pound——

Mr. DIXON. I am merely quoting the London and Boston market.

Mr. REED. Can not the Senator give us some estimate of the amount of increase which results on the average? Can not that be answered by the Senator without doing as a Senator from another State did this morning when I asked him a similar question about wheat, going into a long argument involving the whole tariff question. Can not some of the men who ask for this tariff, and clamor for this tariff, tell us approximately how much it raises the price of wool in cents per pound? Will not the Senator enlighten us on that point?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Missouri knows, and I know, and every Senator in this Chamber knows, that no man on earth can answer that question. You might take all the tables and market reports and lead pencils on earth and you can not give a specific answer to that question.

Mr. REED. Then you can not exactly——

Mr. DIXON. I do say this, that the theory you pursued then in wiping out the tariff did bring bankruptcy to hundreds of thousands of people, and the bill you have reported from the House now, if it becomes a law, as to the tariff on raw wool, will bring about the same result.

Mr. REED. If the Senator can state that it is 2 cents a pound now, and can get at it in cents now and give us the figures, why can he not give us the same figures through those other years without going into the general question of whether it is widespread bankruptcy? That does not answer my question. I want to know if the Senator knows, and if the Senator does not know, then I want him to stand on this floor and frankly confess that he does not know whether an 11-cent tariff is necessary or a 2-cent tariff is necessary.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Missouri I do know that the Democratic tariff on wool that you gave us before put us out of business; but as to actual figures, fluctuations of the market, no man on earth can tell.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. DIXON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to say to the Senator from Missouri that the day the wool bill was reported from the Committee on Finance to the Senate every purchaser of wool in the United States telegraphed to their buyers in Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, Montana, and I believe in every Western State to stop buying wools.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DIXON. When the Senator from Utah finishes.

Mr. SMOOT. The effect of that was that the demand for wool, which came through the feeling that there was not going to be a change in the wool tariff, at least until the next season, ceased.

Mr. REED. Did not that mean simply that the purchaser of wool believed if the tariff was reduced they would buy in a market that was less burdened by taxes and would buy somewhat cheaper, and hence, perhaps, they would wait until they found out whether that reduction would take place. That means, does it not, that the buyers of wool recognized the fact that the tariff does raise the price to the consumer, the purchaser, and is a tax upon the people of the United States?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, your revenue-duty tariff is a tax on the consumer and does raise the price.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Your whole argument falls so far as——

Mr. REED. It is a revenue tariff.

Mr. DIXON. It is robbery just the same, but levied under a different system.

Mr. REED. It is a revenue tariff levied for the honest constitutional purpose of raising revenue. A protective tariff is raised for the dishonest and unconstitutional purpose of enabling one class of citizens to pick the pockets of all the rest of the people.

Mr. DIXON. That is the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. If tariffs are wrong levied under one theory, what difference does it make whether it is an incidental protection or levied for protection outright and open and aboveboard, acknowledged to be for the purpose of keeping the people of this Republic at work and not to depend on the importation of goods from other countries. I ask the Senator from Missouri whether the duty on zinc, which the last tariff bill carried to the great zinc-producing State of Missouri, added anything to the price of zinc and the steadiness of the zinc market in your State?

Mr. REED. My understanding is——

Mr. DIXON. Answer yes or no.

Mr. REED. I am going to answer you, sir. I never dodge a question, and it never takes me half an hour to answer a question by making an argument about something that happened 15 years ago. My understanding is that it has not raised the price of ore to the producers of zinc at all.

Mr. DIXON. Are you willing to have it removed?

Mr. REED. To have it repealed?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. REED. Absolutely.

Mr. DIXON. And the Senator——

Mr REED. And I shall never stand on this floor and cast a vote for the purpose of helping the people or any part of the people of my State rob the rest of the people of the United States. In that respect I differ from some of the Senators on the other side.

Mr. DIXON. Yes. And now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Missouri, in his zeal to stop this robbery, his zeal to prevent this great outrage on the people of this country, why he has not introduced an amendment here proposing a repeal of the duty on Missouri zinc ores?

Mr. REED. I have introduced no amendment on any matter, and for this reason: I want first to see passed this reciprocity bill, which captures one of the outposts of protection which a Republican President, driven by the exigencies of the political conditions, proposes to surrender. When we have taken possession of that position, I then propose to follow the lead of the House of Representatives and vote for those bills which have been sent here. When those bills are out of the way I shall be ready to join in going through the tariff and taking out of it every element except the simple element of revenue.

Mr. DIXON. Then why does the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment.

Mr. DIXON. Let me answer the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. DIXON. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri if I understood him correctly to say that the duty on zinc ore had not increased the price of zinc ore in Missouri a cent?

Mr. REED. I do not think it has.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to get that answer, because, Mr. President, I think I can show the Senator that he is mistaken.

Mr. REED. Zinc ore went up for a time and it went down again, but, taking the market as a whole, it is regarded by the best judges of that district, as I understand, to have been of no benefit. Now, this came about——

Mr. GALLINGER. If it has not affected zinc——

Mr. REED. Our friend Mr. CANNON went through that part of the country and made speeches. He said to the producers of that ore, "If you will vote the Republican ticket, if you vote for my friend Charley Morgan, who stands here on the rear of this platform with me, we will give your people protection; if you do not do it, you will get no protection." That bribe offered to the people is a part of the morality of your beautiful system of protection. Morgan was elected by a small majority; Mr. CANNON redeemed his pledge, and the bill was passed. Zinc ore went up for a little while, but, taking the prices as they have run, I do not think any man can demonstrate that there has been any benefit to that district.

Mr. DIXON. Then, Mr. President, if the tariff on zinc ores has not increased the price, the people of this country have not been robbed by this action in putting a tariff on zinc ores. If it has not increased the price of zinc ores, then by the same argument it would apply to every other article in the list.

Mr. REED. It did not increase the price, as I understand, for various reasons. Among them was the fact that this particular tariff was a subterfuge and a fake from the start; that the ores which came in prior to that time were of the character used in the smelting process, and that they were not in the true sense competitive ores. But that is too broad a question.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that his statement is not correct.

Mr. REED. I will debate that with the Senator from Utah at any time he wants to, and on any occasion, but it is aside from this question.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, all the ores which come into this country which carry more than 10 per cent of zinc pay a duty, while before August 5, 1909, they were free. Every zinc-ore purchaser in this country stated that the average amount of zinc that was in the ores that came from Mexico was near 40 per cent.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. The last tariff bill affects every pound of ore that is imported into this country.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to finish my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana declines to yield further.

Mr. REED. I trust the Senator will allow me to reply to the statement of the Senator from Utah, who did not understand me. I stated that my understanding of the facts was that the ore that came from Mexico was of a character which could be mixed with the native ores and used in smelting, and, therefore, any law that tended to shut it out did not in the long run benefit the miner.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, all the ore which is produced in Missouri is also of such a character that it may be used for smelting.

Mr. DIXON. I will have to shut off the zinc-ore debate, as I want to finish my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana declines to yield further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. I forgot the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. REED. It is not used for smelting, and I am talking about Mexican ores.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana declines to further yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. DIXON. If it is for a discussion of wool I will. I do not want to get off on side issues.

Mr. GORE. It is in reference to sheep. Mr. President, I dislike to disturb the complacency of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but the Census Bureau issued a bulletin on the subject of sheep the day before yesterday, and I invite the Senator's attention to the figures. The official count of sheep and lambs in the United States last year, under the census, was 51,638,590, while the official census count of sheep and lambs in the United States in the year 1900 was 61,503,713.

Mr. DIXON. Somebody certainly has misread the figures to the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator from Oklahoma knows that in 1896 there were 38,000,000 sheep. Does the Senator from Oklahoma think that in four years 38,000,000 sheep would develop into 60,000,000?

Mr. GORE. Within the last 10 minutes I conversed with the Director of the Census. The statement that there were over 61,000,000 sheep in 1900 seemed to me so incredible that I returned to the telephone, called up the Director's office, and had the Director verify the figures, the total number in 1900 being, as he reassured me, 61,503,713.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Statistical Abstract gives it at 41,000,000; and the Statistical Abstract, a Government publication, is supposed to be good authority.

Mr. GORE. Those are estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and sheep are agricultural products.

Mr. GORE. Those are estimates, whilst these, as I understand, are the official figures of the Census Bureau, taken by the enumerators assigned to their several districts throughout the United States, and, according to this advice, the number in 1900 officially counted was 61,503,713. The number last year, according to the census count, was 51,538,690, a falling off according to these official figures—I do not say whether they are right or wrong—of 10,000,000 head of sheep and lambs in the United States.

Now, justice requires me to say that the census of 1900 was taken in June, while the census of last year was taken in April. There was, of course, a larger percentage of lambs expected in 1900 delivered when the census was taken and a smaller number in 1910, and, I take it, the estimate read by the Senator from New Hampshire embraces the estimate for the lambs which were born subsequent to April, 1910.

I ask leave to print in the RECORD, accompanying the table submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire, the preliminary bulletin which has just been issued by the Census Bureau.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SHEEP AND LAMBS ON FARMS AND RANGES.

[Preliminary statement of Thirteenth Census statistics issued by the Census Bureau.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10, 1911.

Statistics relative to sheep and lambs reported on farms and ranges for the United States, by States and geographic divisions, at the Thirteenth Decennial Census, April 15, 1910, are contained in an official statement issued to-day by Acting Director Falkner. It is based on tabular summaries prepared under the direction of Dr. Le Grand Powers, chief statistician for agriculture in the Bureau of the Census. The figures are preliminary and subject to slight revision later, when a few other farms, whose returns are now incomplete, are included in the final tables.

NUMBER OF SHEEP AND LAMBS, 1910 AND 1900, FOR THE UNITED STATES.

In summing up the results Acting Director Falkner states that, for the country as a whole, there was no material change in the sheep industry in the 10 years between 1900 and 1910.

The total number of sheep and lambs in the United States reported for 1910 was 51,638,590, made up of 29,707,000 ewes, 7,148,366 rams and wethers, 12,168,278 lambs, and 2,614,946 sheep and lambs not classified by age or sex in the 1910 reports. In 1900 the total number reported was 61,503,713, comprising 31,857,652 ewes, 7,995,315 rams and wethers, and 21,650,746 lambs.

The public is cautioned that, owing to the different dates of enumeration in 1900 and 1910, the figures for lambs are not comparable for the two periods. As previously shown, the number reported in 1900 as of date June 1 was 21,650,746, while in 1910 the number returned as of April 15 was only 12,168,278. This decrease is said by the Acting Director to be more apparent than real. If the enumeration in 1910 had taken place as of June 1, the number of lambs at the two census periods would probably have been approximately the same as shown by the other statistics.

Excluding the lambs from consideration, the other figures are fairly comparable. Such action would leave a net total of 39,470,312 wool-producing sheep for 1910, as compared with 39,852,967 for 1900. The 1910 total will be slightly changed in the final reports of the Thirteenth Census by the tabulation of supplemental schedules for Arizona and New Mexico, which will add approximately 100,000 to the number stated. Hence, it is seen that there was actually a decrease of only 1 per cent in the net total number of wool-producing sheep in 1910 as finally to be compared with the corresponding total for 1900.

The figures in the present statement do not include the number of wool-producing sheep reported for cities and towns as distinct from those on farms and ranges given herein. Their total in 1900 was 179,600, while the preliminary tabulation now in progress indicates that the total for 1910 was approximately 255,600.

INCREASES AND DECREASES BY GEOGRAPHIC DIVISIONS.

The very slight decrease in the total number of wool-producing sheep was not uniform for all parts of the United States. The total number reported for the North Atlantic division was 1,566,033 in 1910, as compared with 2,533,579 in 1900, a decrease of approximately 1,000,000, distributed throughout all the States in that area. The South Atlantic division reported 1,552,284 in 1910, as compared with 1,706,199 in 1900, a decrease of about 154,000; the South Central division, 3,165,905, against 3,328,848 in 1900, a decrease of about 163,000; the North Central division, 10,069,451 in 1910, as compared with 10,055,721, an increase of about 14,000; and the Western division, 23,116,639 in 1910, against 22,228,620, an increase of nearly 1,000,000. The total change in the South Atlantic, South Central, and North Central divisions, therefore, was almost negligible and not at all uniform. A group of States, comprising Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, shows increases, whereas the States north and south of this central group show decreases. In the Western division Colorado, California, and Washington show slight decreases; Utah, a decrease of nearly 1,000,000; and New Mexico, a loss of 400,000. The other States show material increases.

NUMBER OF WOOL-PRODUCING SHEEP BY STATES.

In the North Atlantic division the number of wool-producing sheep reported for Maine was 149,934 in 1910 and 252,213 in 1900; New Hampshire, 31,201 in 1910 and 65,318 in 1900; Vermont, 84,360 in 1910 and 182,167 in 1900; Massachusetts, 22,672 in 1910 and 33,869 in 1900; Rhode Island, 4,206 in 1910 and 6,629 in 1900; Connecticut, 14,043 in 1910 and 23,021 in 1900; New York, 605,655 in 1910 and 984,516 in 1900; New Jersey, 16,593 in 1910 and 26,363 in 1900; and Pennsylvania, 637,369 in 1910 and 959,483 in 1900.

In the South Atlantic division the number of wool-producing sheep reported for Delaware was 4,415 in 1910 and 6,964 in 1900; Maryland, 126,251 in 1910 and 111,520 in 1900; District of Columbia, none; Virginia, 437,988 in 1910 and 392,125 in 1900; West Virginia, 564,378 in 1910 and 572,739 in 1900; North Carolina, 139,884 in 1910 and 208,812 in 1900; South Carolina, 28,024 in 1910 and 52,436 in 1900; Georgia, 154,442 in 1910 and 258,894 in 1900; and Florida, 96,902 in 1910 and 102,709 in 1900.

In the South Central division the number of wool-producing sheep reported for Kentucky was 776,894 in 1910 and 716,158 in 1900; Tennessee, 470,478 in 1910 and 307,804 in 1900; Alabama, 111,183 in 1910 and 229,298 in 1900; Mississippi, 156,506 in 1910 and 236,470 in 1900; Louisiana, 140,242 in 1910 and 169,234 in 1900; Texas, 1,364,554 in 1910 and 1,439,940 in 1900; Oklahoma, 48,766 in 1910 and 61,183 in 1900; and Arkansas, 97,282 in 1910 and 168,761 in 1900.

In the north central division the number of wool-producing sheep reported for Ohio was 2,892,272 in 1910 and 2,648,250 in 1900; Indiana, 812,427 in 1910 and 1,010,648 in 1900; Illinois, 661,484 in 1910 and 629,150 in 1900; Michigan, 1,545,241 in 1910 and 1,625,930 in 1900; Wisconsin, 628,539 in 1910 and 986,212 in 1900; Minnesota, 452,043 in 1910 and 359,328 in 1900; Iowa, 769,917 in 1910 and 657,868 in 1900; Missouri, 1,114,216 in 1910 and 663,703 in 1900; North Dakota, 239,114 in 1910 and 451,437 in 1900; South Dakota, 502,505 in 1910 and 507,338 in 1900; Nebraska, 245,195 in 1910 and 335,950 in 1900; and Kansas, 206,498 in 1910 and 179,907 in 1900.

In the western division the number of wool-producing sheep reported for Montana was 4,978,963 in 1910 and 4,215,214 in 1900; Wyoming, 4,676,206 in 1910 and 3,327,185 in 1900; Colorado, 1,313,048 in 1910 and 1,352,823 in 1900; New Mexico, 2,931,201 in 1910 and 3,333,743 in 1900; Arizona, 843,383 in 1910 and 668,458 in 1900; Utah, 1,670,890 in 1910 and 2,553,134 in 1900; Nevada, 810,973 in 1910 and 568,251 in 1900; Idaho, 2,160,029 in 1910 and 1,965,467 in 1900; Washington, 308,862 in 1910 and 558,022 in 1900; Oregon, 1,982,552 in 1910 and 1,961,355 in 1900; and California, 1,440,532 in 1910 and 1,724,968 in 1900.

NUMBER OF FARMS REPORTING SHEEP.

Although the number of mature sheep decreased very slightly during the decade, the number of farms reporting sheep decreased from 763,518 to 608,363, which is 155,155, or 20 per cent. The decrease in the number of farms in the North Atlantic States was at practically the same rate as the decrease in the number of mature sheep, leaving the average number of sheep per farm approximately 21 at both periods.

In the South Atlantic division, however, there was a decrease of practically 30,000 in the number of farms reporting, with only a slight decrease in the number of sheep. In 1900 the number of mature sheep per farm in that group of States was 16, whereas in 1910 the average number per farm had increased to 20.

In the south central division the number of farms fell off about 44,000, which is a much greater relative decrease than that in the number of sheep. In 1900 the average number of sheep per farm was 22, whereas in 1910 it was about 20.

In the north central division both the number of farms and the number of mature sheep increased slightly, the number of sheep per farm being about 29 at each census period.

In the western division the increase in number of farms corresponds very closely to the increase in number of sheep; the average number of sheep per farm reporting being approximately 900 at each of the censuses.

WOOL.

The number of fleeces of wool and the total weight of the wool clip for 1909 has not yet been completely tabulated. The average weight per fleece for a group of 16 States already tabulated is 7.4 pounds. In 1900 the average weight per fleece for these States was 6.8 pounds, and for the entire United States 6.3 pounds. If the average weight for the entire United States for 1909 is 7.4 pounds, the aggregate weight of wool shorn in that year, including that clipped from the sheep on farms and in cities at the date of enumeration, and that shorn from sheep afterwards slaughtered in the spring of 1910, before the date of enumeration, will be approximately 296,000,000 pounds, while if the average weight for the farms of the country is only 7 pounds, the weight of the farm clip will not greatly differ from that returned by the census of 1900, or about 277,000,000 pounds.

SUMMARY FOR THE UNITED STATES, BY STATES.

[1] Includes for 1910 lambs born between Jan. 1 and Apr. 15; for 1900, lambs under 1 year old June 1.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I now wish to ask one question of the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] or the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I myself do not know about the matter, and I desire either one of them to tell me the price in the United States to-day of the three grades of wool—fine, medium, and coarse—and the price of the same grades of wool in England to-day.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator right now that in the last 10 days or 2 weeks there has been a gradual decrease in the market, until to-day there is practically no wool market. It has gone. I want to say now——

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. DIXON. I must insist on having the floor some of the time. I will read the telegram I sent for awhile ago for the benefit of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I see the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has left the Chamber. It is dated Billings, Mont., July 10, and is as follows:

> Wool conditions worse than since 1893. Many clips unsold. Buyers will not buy until they know what action Congress will take upon the wool schedule.

The telegram is signed by a prominent citizen of Montana.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Montana if that telegram was sent in response to a telegram from him?

Mr. DIXON. Absolutely no.

Mr. GORE. Very well. Then I will ask the Senators from Montana and Utah to state the price of wool in the United States on June 20, the day before the bill revising the wool schedule was referred to the committee, and the price of wool in England on June 20. I do not know the prices, and want to find out.

Mr. DIXON. That would be just like asking a man how many grains of dirt there are on Pennsylvania Avenue between here and the White House. Nobody can tell that. I will say generally, however, making a rough off-hand statement, that at that time the price of wool in this country was about 17 cents a pound and on the London market about 14 or 15 cents; that is, roughly speaking.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course——

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wyoming can probably give more accurate figures than those I have given.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma asks for the prices of the three grades of wool on June 20 in this country and in England.

Mr. GORE. I do not mean that particular date, I will say to the Senator, but prior to the reference of the wool bill.

Mr. SMOOT. On the different classes of wool the prices vary according to the shrinkage of the wool and according to its length and fineness.

Mr. GORE. I realize that.

Mr. SMOOT. The price of first-class wool in London would run all the way from 16 cents up to 24 at that particular time, and perhaps it may have been a little higher; this, of course, is wool in the grease. In this country, in the Boston market, it would run all the way, I should say, from 18 cents to 22 cents, or about that. I could go on and tell the Senator the price for second-class and third-class wool, but the prices are all different.

Mr. GORE. Of course, I know of the varieties of grade, but I had been informed by a man in the wool business that wool in England was selling higher than it was in the United States, grade for grade.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not true.

Mr. WARREN. It is not true.

Mr. GORE. I did not know, but I wanted to find out.

Mr. DIXON. In the neighborhood of 2 cents has been about the average difference, as I remember, in the price.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. With reference to what the Senator from Oklahoma has quoted, I will say, it is true that the latest figures of the census show a shortage in the number of sheep as compared with the number a year ago. Winter before last in Wyoming and in portions of the neighboring States—as, for instance, in Montana—was the most disastrous that has ever been known since the settlement of that country. Wyoming, which has more sheep than any other State in the Union, according to the records——

Mr. BAILEY. Not according to the records.

Mr. WARREN. According to the records. I assert it again.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Government publications are wrong.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator from Wyoming was a little mistaken when he corrected the Senator from Montana, but I did not choose to interfere. The difference is small, but Montana——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to say that Montana has led for a number of years; and it is only within two years that the claim of Wyoming has been that she has more sheep than Montana, and perhaps when I have finished——

Mr. BAILEY. On April 1, 1910—that is within two years—Montana had 4,800,000 and Wyoming had 4,650,000 sheep.

Mr. WARREN. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. BAILEY. The Statistical Abstract published by the Government of the United States—not always accurate, I will grant you, but we must use it.

Mr. WARREN. I do not care to be led into that question just now, in the time of the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], because the Senator from Montana himself and I have no quarrel as to that, and we all know that no other States in the Union have near as many sheep as either Montana or Wyoming. I want to say as to the number of sheep that the decrease in the State of Wyoming was considered to be by many more than 33⅓ per cent.

The loss was nearly as great in Montana. Not only was the weather in December and January more severe than we had ever known before, but the breeding season was so interfered with because of the cold that the lamb crop of the next spring was only about half the usual number, and that winter and bad lambing season was followed by the driest summer we have ever had. The tariff, of course, is not responsible for that in any manner. I am glad to say that the last winter was the best we have ever had, and that the lamb crop was the largest, and another year will show probably that we have made up that shortage.

As to the figures in 1900, that is a matter that has been up and discussed here before. That arises from changing the time of the count and counting lambs in one year that were not counted in another. For instance, lambs born in May are sold for slaughter oftentimes in September and October by the thousands and even by the millions, taken altogether; and so, if you make the count on the 1st day of July, you get quite a different number from that you would get on the 1st day of October or the 1st day of January or the 1st day of April. That is best proved by taking the number of sheep each year up to 1900 and from 1900 since, which shows conclusively that some error occurred in the computation for that one year.

Mr. DIXON. Now, Mr. President, I must finish my remarks. I did not get up to discuss the wool tariff. I was led into it incidentally; but on the pending motion, which is——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, just one word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana further yield?

Mr. DIXON. Only for a short question.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say that the explanation of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is entirely satisfactory to me. I did not know whether the falling off was due to panic, tempest, or drought, but I did know that the necessary disaster would be available and forthcoming.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say, Mr. President, a few words regarding the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], known as the free-list bill. I think it is superfluous for me to repeat the statement that I am a protectionist and have always tried to be consistent in my votes on the protective tariff. I voted for the Payne bill, not because I believed it was perfect, but because I thought it was the best that could be had at the time. At this time, however, I am compelled to cast my vote in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, known as the free-list bill, and in perfect frankness I want to state why.

Any tariff, whether protective or for revenue, should cover all phases of industry. A minority of the Republican Party at this session of Congress is drifting from its ancient moorings. Evidently by the vote of this Senate, including all of the Democratic Senators but three or four and a minority of the Republican Senators from the great manufacturing States, by their votes are going deliberately and purposely, and I started to say with malice aforethought, to strip from the farmers of this country every vestige of the protective tariff as it applies to them except on the one article of wool, and yet hope to adjourn without revising the general tariff schedules.

I want to say if Canadian reciprocity passes and becomes a law I am ready to stay here until December and go through the whole list. I notice the so-called free-list amendment is grouped into four or five classes—agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, barbed wire, and lumber. I remember two years ago in the discussion of the Payne bill, during that long, hot summer, a gentleman from Jersey City, N. J., or possibly Newark—one of the cities right near New York—was over here. He was a leather manufacturer over here lobbying for free hides. He came to my office and attempted to convert me to that theory. He said he was a Democrat in politics, and I asked him by what theory of equity or rule of reason he asked me to vote to remove the 15 per cent duty on hides and yet vote to maintain a duty on manufactured leather. He attempted to give me some kind of an argument that hides was a by-product of the farmer and that the tariff on hides was simply a subterfuge, a delusion, and a snare.

After the duty on hides had been removed he came back to my office in a very jocular manner. He exultingly called my attention to the fact that the duty had been removed on hides anyway, notwithstanding my opposition, and I then said to him that if, in the goodness of an all-wise Providence, I should ever happen to be a Member of the American Congress when tariff duties were again revised, remembering the propaganda entered into at that time by the manufacturers of leather, the tanners, and the shoe men to remove the little pittance that the farmer did receive from his hides of cattle—if I knew how to do equity, not in a spirit of revenge, but in dealing out cold-blooded equity to these same people I would never again vote for a duty on shoes or leather or any product of leather. I expect this afternoon thus to register my vote.

If these amendments came up under normal conditions, when the Republican Senators from the New England States were trying to do equity to all classes and all sections, it would be different, but when I see the principle of protection deserted by the very men representing communities in this Senate Chamber who ought to be its stanchest defenders; when I see Senators from New England united with the Democratic Senators from the South, deliberately destroying the protection of the Northwestern farmer by the enactment of the so-called Canadian reciprocity bill, while it may not be abstractly right, when I see that thing happen in this Chamber, then my vote will be cast for the free-list bill to bring home to these men and these communities and these industries the great lesson of doing unto others as you would have others do unto you. I am satisfied that in the present abnormal condition of tariff discussion and tariff agitation it is the only way you are ever going to invoke a square deal in writing a tariff schedule in this country, and for that reason I expect to support by my vote the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, just a word, and that not upon the pending matter.

Yesterday afternoon at the close of the session I uttered a rather bitter reflection upon the Hon. Robert J. Walker, accusing him of downright and positive falsehood. I had not at that time supposed there was any doubt in the mind of any man as to the correctness or accuracy of what I said. But the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] surprised me by saying he had never before heard that accusation against Mr. Walker. That being true, I am sure I was mistaken in assuming that it was a matter of universal knowledge, and being mistaken in that supposition I feel that I owe it to myself to incorporate into the RECORD the proof of the charge I made.

I have here the great work of Jefferson Davis, entitled "The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government," and in that book he alludes to this very misconduct of Walker. He does not mention him by name, but everybody familiar with the history of that time knows that he here referred to Mr. Walker by designation if not by name.

Discussing the Confederate Government's foreign debt in the preceding paragraph, he then says:

Great efforts had previously been made by agents of the United States Government to reflect upon the credit of the Confederate States by resuscitating an almost forgotten accusation of repudiation against the State of Mississippi, and especially by an emissary sent to Great Britain, than whom no one knew better how false were the attempts to implicate my name in that charge.

The emissary sent to Great Britain, of course, was the Hon. Robert J. Walker.

I have here the only history of Mississippi I have ever read, and so far as I know the only one of that State ever published. It was written by the Hon. John H. F. Claiborne, who was once a Member of the House of Representatives and was one of the contestees in the most famous contested-election case ever tried by the House of Representatives. He was one of the contestees in the famous case of Prentiss and Word v. Claiborne and Gholson. I ask the clerk to read the paragraph which I have indicated by pencil mark.

There is some bitter reflection on Mr. Walker that I would not myself care to incorporate into the RECORD, but it is the history, and I ask that it be read inasmuch as I made the charge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In his professional life, after his retirement from the Treasury, his practice was chiefly confined to a few large cases with heavy contingent fees, and he thus became associated with a class of reckless and sometimes not very clean speculators, more or less to his injury, though sometimes profitable.

Among these he got as a fee an interest in the celebrated "New Almaden quicksilver mine" in California. After protracted and expensive litigation his party won it, but the defeated party refused to give possession, and military preparations were made on both sides. A compromise, however, was effected by allowing a million and three-quarters for a peaceable relinquishment. Mr. Walker disposed of his interest for near $500,000, and was about that time appointed by President Lincoln, on the recommendation of Secretary Seward, financial agent in Europe for the United States. The main object of his mission was to discredit the Confederate States and cripple their efforts to obtain money and recognition. In this he fully succeeded. Forgetting that all he was he owed to the generous people of Mississippi, who had lifted him from poverty and obscurity, he denounced her for repudiating just debts and implicated President Davis, who had never had any connection, direct or contingent, with the subject. But while, Casca-like, stabbing his best friend, he forgot to mention that the sinking fund, which had been set apart for this very debt, he had contrived to borrow, and afterwards refused payment except in depreciated warrants. The spirit of nationality might properly have induced Mr. Walker to adhere to the Federal Government, but he should never have accepted a service directly against his early benefactors and best friends. On this mission Mr. Walker appeared in great state. He traveled with a large retinue of attachés and servants, with the air of an imperial prince. How much of the public money and how much of his own he expended in this pageantry it is needless to inquire. This suddenly acquired fortune melted rapidly away, and the great financier, after this last crusade against his early friends, is understood to have died in embarrassed circumstances. He was indebted to Mississippi for his earthly honors, and it is painful to record that his last energies were earnestly employed to crush and destroy her.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just one moment. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas a question. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas whether the adoption of this amendment and its enactment into law will extend to the manufacturers and tradesmen of the world the free and unrestricted market in the United States for the articles enumerated in this amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. It was intended to do that, and I think it would do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. It would be a waste of the Senate's time to call the roll. I shall not ask to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The "noes" have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I now intend to offer the woolen schedule. It is, however, about the adjournment time, and I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will now move an adjournment. I can offer the amendment and have it pending.

Mr. PENROSE. I would suggest to the Senator from Texas that he offer the amendment and have it pending, if that is entirely agreeable to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas offers the following amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. As the other amendment would have been section 4, it having been defeated, I will ask the Secretary to number the first section of it section 4, and so on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask, instead of reading the amendment, to have it printed in the RECORD, so that it will appear there in the morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that course will be followed.

The amendment is as follows:

Add new section as follows:

"SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, the articles hereinafter enumerated, described, and provided for shall, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), be subjected to the duties hereinafter provided, and no others; that is to say:

"1. On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"2. On all noils, top waste, card waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, bur waste, thread waste, garnetted waste, shoddies, mungo, flocks, wool extract, carbonized wool, carbonized noils, and on all other wastes and on rags composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"3. On combed wool or tops and roving or roping, made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair, and on other wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"4. On yarns made wholly or in part of wool the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"5. On cloths, knit fabrics, felts not woven, and all manufactures of every description made, by any process, wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"6. On blankets and flannels, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That on flannels composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at above 50 cents per pound, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

"7. On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"8. On clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, and not specially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"9. On webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, on any of the foregoing made of wool or of which wool is a component material, whether containing india rubber or not, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"10. On Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpetings of like character or description, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

"11. On Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

"12. On Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"13. On velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpetings of like character or description, the duty shall be 35 per cent ad valorem.

"14. On tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, printed on the warp or otherwise, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"15. On treble ingrain, 3-ply, and all-chain Venetian carpets, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"16. On wool Dutch and 2-ply ingrain carpets, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"17. On carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms, and Oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs, the duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem.

"18. On druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"19. On carpets and carpeting of wool, flax, or cotton, or composed in part of any of them, not specially provided for in this act, and on mats, matting, and rugs of cotton, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"20. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bed sides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting, made wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpeting of like character or description.

"21. Whenever in this act the word 'wool' is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animals, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

"SEC. 5. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported, and hereinbefore enumerated, described, and provided for, for which no entry has been made, and all such goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by this act and no other duty, upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof.

"SEC. 6. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1912."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 4 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 13, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 12, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. Paul R. Hickok, of Metropolitan Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., as follows:

We praise Thee, O Lord, our God, for the assurance we have that Thou art present, that Thou art the rewarder of those who diligently seek after Thee. We come before Thee now confessing Thy sovereignty over us and invoking Thy blessing. Pardon all our iniquities, we pray, and fill us with a stronger purpose after righteousness. May we know Thy will, and may we earnestly desire to perform Thy will.

Give Thy richest blessings unto all Thy servants everywhere, and especially to the Members and officers of this House in their deliberations and in their enactments. Give Thy very special and merciful blessing to all those who are ill or burdened or tempted or who are passing through tribulations. Particularly would we ask Thy blessing for the household of that one of the Members of this House recently deceased, and we earnestly beseech Thee that the comfort which cometh from the Most High may come to each one of them.

Mercifully preserve and protect, O God, the loved ones who are far away. Increase our own love for our country and our devotion to our institutions, and in all our comings and goings let the words of our mouths and the motives of our hearts be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. We ask it in the Master's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 8, 1911, was read and approved.

to the Committee on Printing.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand there are a few informal orders that gentlemen desire to ask for this morning, and I therefore move to dispense with the proceedings under the calendar for to-day, this being Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, to dispense with the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday for to-day.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, move to disagree to the Senate amendments, and to ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 12109, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and move to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on disagreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees on the part of the House:

Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. CANNON.

IMPORTATION OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill H. R. 12312, to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report (No. 61), ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that probably by unanimous consent we can pass the bill now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from New York that I will be very glad to call it up in the House and pass it now. It has not been printed, of course, but it comes here with the unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means. It merely corrects a mistake that was made in the Senate in reference to paragraph 500 of the tariff act. I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to call up the bill that I have just reported, and that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12312, amending paragraph 500 of the tariff act, may be considered now in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the report fully explains the bill, and instead of taking up the time of the House in making an explanation, I will ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first read the bill and then the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12312) to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," shall be so amended as to read as follows:

"500. Articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when returned after having been exported, without having been advanced in value or improved in condition by any process of manufacture or other means; casks, barrels, carboys, bags, and other containers or coverings of American manufacture exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, including shooks and staves when returned as barrels or boxes; also quicksilver flasks or bottles, iron or steel drums used for the shipment of acids, of either domestic or foreign manufacture, which shall have been actually exported from the United States; but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made, under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the exemption of bags from duty shall apply only to such domestic bags as may be imported by the exporter thereof, and if any such articles are subject to internal-revenue tax at the time of exportation, such tax shall be proved to have been paid before exportation and not refunded; photographic dry plates or films of American manufacture (except moving-picture films), exposed abroad, whether developed or not, and films from moving-picture machines, light struck or otherwise damaged, or worn out, so as to be unsuitable for any other purpose than the recovery of the constituent materials, provided the basic films are of American manufacture, but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any article upon which an allowance of drawback has been made, the reimportation of which is hereby prohibited except upon payment of duties equal to the drawbacks allowed; or to any article manufactured in bonded warehouse and exported under any provision of law: And provided further, That when manufactured tobacco which has been exported without payment of internal-revenue tax shall be reimported it shall be retained in the custody of the collector of customs until internal-revenue stamps in payment of the legal duties shall be placed thereon: And provided further, That cattle, horses, sheep, and other domestic animals straying across the boundary line into any foreign country or driven across such boundary line by the owners for temporary pasturage purposes only, together with their offspring, shall be dutiable, unless brought back to the United States within six months, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 492."

The Clerk read the report (No. 61), as follows:

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 12312:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12312) to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

Paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, provides for the return free of duty "articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, not including animals." The phrase "not including animals" was introduced into the bill on the floor of the Senate and subsequent to the report of the bill from the Senate committee. It was not in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. The language used was obviously intended to limit the conduct of cattle feeders and breeders along the border lines and was not intended to limit animals which are transported into Canada or Mexico for temporary purposes and returned after a short stay in the foreign country. To hold that such animals would be dutiable would, in effect, be to place a prohibition upon domestic-born animals which was not placed on foreign-born animals and which clearly was not contemplated by Congress at the time the law was passed.

The Secretary of the Treasury, on June 16, 1911, wrote the following letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, which fully explains the necessity for the passage of this bill:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 16, 1911.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I invite your attention to the case of Bragg v. The United States, decided in the United States Court of Customs Appeals, May 1, 1911 (T. D., 31575), of which I inclose herewith a copy. This decision upset the practice of the department to admit domestic animals exported and returned free of duty, except as are expressly provided for under paragraph 492 of the tariff act of August 5, 1909. I also invite your attention to a decision of the department of April 1, 1910 (T. D., 30481), a copy of which I inclose herewith, which indicates the reasons for the attitude of the department with respect to the meaning of the words "not including animals," as it appears in the paragraph 500 of the tariff act of August 5, 1909.

In view of the decision of the court in the Bragg case, however, the department has felt constrained to alter its practice and to issue instructions for the collection of duty on all domestic animals taken abroad and returned, except those straying or driven across the boundary line, as provided by paragraph 492. These instructions went into effect on June 1, 1911.

While article 659 of the Customs Regulations of 1908 provided for the free entry of teams and vehicles of domestic origin returning from Canada or Mexico on the production of evidence establishing the fact of domestic origin, there is some doubt as to the propriety of continuing this provision in force even to accommodate express companies and merchants who make daily trips into Canada or Mexico at such places as Detroit, El Paso, etc. In any event, the result will be that any domestic-bred saddle horses taken into Canada, Bermuda, or other near-by places for pleasure will be dutiable upon their return, and the same will be true of all other domestic pet animals taken out of the country. (See paragraphs 225–229, inclusive, of the tariff act of 1909.)

In view of these circumstances, I have the honor to suggest that paragraph 500 of the tariff act be amended by striking out in the second line thereof the words "not including animals," and by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"And provided further, That cattle, horses, sheep, and other domestic animals straying across the boundary line into any foreign country, or driven across such boundary line by the owners for temporary pasturage purposes only, together with their offspring, shall be dutiable unless brought back to the United States within six months, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 492."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as the report shows, the words "not including animals" were added to section 500 of the Payne tariff bill. The courts have decided that if those words remain in the bill it prevents a man from riding his horse across the border and coming back without paying duty on it, or taking domestic animals across the border and coming back. The object of the bill is merely to restore the old law, as suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, and save this hardship to people living on the border.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was the character of the case in which this decision arose? What kind of an animal was subject to a tax which resulted in this legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the decision was in reference to domestic animals. I think it was a horse or cattle or something of that kind which resulted in the decision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was it not a dog case?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think there was a dog case also, but I do not think that is the decision to which the Secretary refers that made the Court of Appeals——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Alabama says this is a unanimous report on this bill amending the Payne-Aldrich law. Was there any report from the Tariff Board approving this legislation? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think we are enabled to successfully report this bill without the intervention of the Tariff Board.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like a few minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the bill is to be considered under the five-minute rule, and I have not the right to yield, but the gentleman can take the floor in his own time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment, reading the first paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," shall be so amended as to read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting bill. A short time since a citizen of the United States of the female sex, returning from a trip abroad, was halted by the customs officials and informed that under the present tariff law her Pomeranian dog was subject to a tax. There was great consternation in administration circles at once. Here was this poor, suffering pup, taken abroad for its health by its unhappy mistress, and upon returning, restored to its former good health, the ruthless hand of the tax collector was stretched out and the announcement was made that this reinvigorated Pomeranian could not enter the sacred portals of the United States unless a contribution was made to the Treasury. As a result of the agitation over this, not mongrel, yellow dog, but Pomeranian pup, which, I believe, is a dog of aristocratic pedigree, the entire wheels of legislation were started with a rapidity unknown in recent years. And it became necessary in this sweltering weather to bring back to this city the eminent gentlemen composing the Committee on Ways and Means in order that these reinvigorated and restored pups might be admitted without having their owners subjected to the penalty of contributing a fair tax to the United States Government. There was no demand for a report from the Tariff Board, no insistence that this bill go over to the regular session of Congress until the Tariff Board could investigate it and determine whether the conditions were such that these domestic animals should be permitted to come in free of duty. [Applause and laughter.] But the imperative demand is made, and the Secretary of the Treasury writes a special letter to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, calling his attention to the necessity for action at once. And I was astounded when I saw my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE] imploring the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to ask unanimous consent to take this bill up at once, even before it was in print so that Members could examine it, in order that relief might be afforded to such people.

Mr. Speaker, I recall that during the last session of Congress, when a colleague of my own and of himself introduced a bill to suspend the duties on meats for one year and put meats upon the free list, in order that the suffering people of the United States might be relieved from the exactions of the Beef Trust and obtain for themselves necessary subsistence at a reasonable cost, the gentleman from New York declined to call a meeting of the Committee on Ways and Means even to consider the bill; and he made the announcement that after a canvass among the Republican members of that committee it was determined that no legislation correcting any of the iniquities or inequalities of the law which bore his honored name would even be considered by the committee. How unfortunate! It was only the suffering people of the United States——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not a pack of Pomeranian pups or of mongrel dogs, or even of yellow dogs, that had suddenly been brought back to our attractive shores and had set up their pitiful bark and appeal for relief. If it had been, I am certain under those circumstances the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] would have hastily gathered his committee together and reported a bill to afford relief both to the domestic animal affected and to the dilettante owners who came back from trips abroad for their various ailments and afflictions and could not bear to be subjected to any inconvenience or annoyance. Mr. Speaker, all through the country there has been a most violent complaint about our customs regulations affecting returning tourists. In the examination of their personal effects they have been subjected to unparalleled indignities. The average American citizen returning to this country from abroad, under the administration of the present law, is treated as a criminal.

And yet, in spite of the protests that have arisen from these men and women and in spite of the indignities to which they have been subjected upon the wharves of the cities at which the trans-Atlantic liners dock, no one has suggested undue haste to so legislate as to ameliorate the conditions existing and to treat American citizens as though they were what they are—honest and reputable persons, willing to pay whatever taxes might properly be imposed upon their importations. But once the unholy hand of the taxgatherer was laid upon this pet Pomeranian pup then a new condition arose, and it was necessary that the Congress expeditiously and quickly and speedily, without delay, should afford relief, so that these poor afflicted animals might not be separated from their fair possessors, even momentarily. [Laughter.] I am delighted that at last the country has had an opportunity to ascertain just what particular thing in this country suffering under the iniquitous provisions of the Payne-Aldrich bill would appeal to the sympathy of the minority in this House and would actuate the Republicans to unite in a unanimous report and to implore speedy action in order to obtain relief. [Laughter.] I trust that when the next bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, designed not so much to relieve those who might be annoyed because their pet dogs would be interfered with, but in order to give relief to the people, the great masses of the people, will be brought in here, we will have the same unanimity of opinion and the same desire for speedy action from that part of the House. [Laughter.] I am certain that the country will rejoice at such an exhibition of reform and disinterested spirit on the part of that side on behalf of the people, rather than, as appears to be the record of the party, in favor of legislation for special interests. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I find now that the dog—pet, mongrel, or whatever else—has been classed with the other special interests which obtain speedy relief at the hands of the minority. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care for an extension.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman deplores the fact that this legislation is in the interest of dogs, rather than in the interest of the people. But does he not think that its terms are broad enough to include frankfurters, and thus indirectly relieve the people in some degree? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not deplore, Mr. Speaker, the fact that this legislation is in the interest of dogs. I am glad that even dogs will have their day at the hands of the minority. The people have had their day denied and postponed so long that perhaps it is a promise for the future when the minority is willing to recognize that the "dog shall have his day," and the time may be coming when they will be willing to give the people an equal opportunity of relief. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an observation and ask a question. It has often been said and is well known that a mongrel dog frequently makes the best trick dog; but in order to bring the matter to the attention of the gentleman from New York and to the House, I would ask the gentleman from New York if he would not be gracious enough to inform me who owns this pup that he speaks about? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am not sufficiently interested in the pup to have obtained the information requested. I refer the gentleman to the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means, all of whom favor this legislation, and perhaps they will be able to satisfy the gentleman, privately, and he may not then care to ventilate the information that he obtains. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, when my distinguished colleague, with his bright mind——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman appear on behalf of the pup? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I appear on behalf of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], my friend and colleague, and you may call him whatever name you choose. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the gentleman's colleague, even if a mongrel pup, would not seek the assistance of the gentleman from New York. There are many on this side of the House who could look after his interest, even if he were incompetent to look after it himself.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I am simply a volunteer [laughter], Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is so bright, usually so well informed, and who works so diligently to keep up with the business of the House, can not see anything more in this bill than a yellow pup, or the relief of the owner of a yellow pup, it shows the necessity for the report of a Tariff Board, even upon such a bill as this, or the necessity for some other information to inform the intelligence on that side of the House as to the nature and scope of the bill and why it should be passed.

This clause was put in the Dingley law as we are putting it in the law to-day. It was put in at the request of some cattle owners in the State of Texas, who desired to drive their cattle over into Mexico, feed them there, and bring them back again at the end of the period of the pasturing season, in order to produce beef for the free citizens of the United States, and save the grass of Texas for the other live animals there, including cattle and sheep. So you get into not only the beef business, but the mutton business and the wool business in the State of Texas in this little bill.

The bill reported by the chairman of the committee is precisely as was the Dingley bill in this particular, in regard to this paragraph, and precisely as was the present law as it left the House; but some Senator moved this amendment and it was not considered at great length in the Senate and the conference committee overlooked it; so it was agreed to; and it shuts out not only my friend's friend, the little yellow dog, but it shuts out the cattle and the privilege of pasturing them in Mexico and in Canada, and it shuts out even the sending of horses over there and bringing them back again. If my friend should go to Niagara Falls and cross the bridge, the hackman who takes him across would not be able to get back again unless he paid the duty on his horses—all because of this amendment that was put in in the Senate. Now, the House can see by the few things that I have said how proper it is that this bill should pass, and how ill-fitted and ill-timed the criticisms on it by my distinguished friend and colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and he possibly would not have made them if he had had the intelligence on the subject that the Tariff Board might have furnished after they had considered the question or that he could have obtained from any member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know, but it has not been stated and I would like to know, if any inquiry has been made into the question of what is the difference in the cost of production of the Pomeranian pup abroad and at home?

Mr. PAYNE. I would state to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that all those questions were considered years ago, and the Republicans generally are pretty well posted on them. Of course, I despair of my friend ever learning anything on the subject, even if we get a report on it from the Tariff Board.

Mr. HARDY. I presume that question was gone into when the Payne tariff bill was under consideration?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not remember any such thing, Mr. Speaker, but if the gentleman will look through the 10,000 pages of testimony taken on that bill, he may find some enlightenment in those pages even on that subject. I know if he will diligently inquire, even though the weather is hot, he will be able to forget all about the weather.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes. He has not done much yet. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection..

Mr. PAYNE. I would be willing to yield the floor with what I have said in reply to the gentleman's 10 or 15 minutes when he had the floor [applause on the Republican side], but I want to make one suggestion more to the gentleman, and that is that he should get in his mind a comparison of things. Some things are larger than others, of course. The wool and woolen schedule is the most important in the law. At great expense the Tariff Board are getting a great deal of information on that subject, as I happen to know from recent inquiry of that board; and I think they will be able to present some information in December upon which even my colleague could make an improvement on the Democratic caucus bill, if he were advised, as I presume it will get through his understanding by that time, of the fact that there has been a surplus the last year of $15,800,000 under the present law—I mean the year ending June 30, 1910—and the surplus of $46,000,000 or $47,000,000 under the year ending June 30, 1911; and he will not be frightened in regard to our having a deficit or a growing deficiency in the Treasury or anything of that kind, and if he would calm his mind and understanding and focus them upon the real question in regard to the revision of Schedule K, I think perhaps he would get it in such a shape that he would offer some amendments even to the caucus bill—in the caucus, of course, not in the House—and would be unwilling to be bound hand and foot by a Democratic caucus on a bill which he knew nothing about and which even some of his friends on the committee told me they did not know anything about on that side of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the gentleman to say that by December we might have enough information to justify a revision of Schedule K.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the Tariff Board will present additional facts on the wool schedule, so that even the gentleman from

New York, my colleague, and his friends on that side of the House would understand, so that they could get at a more intelligent revision of the wool schedule than now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Even as long ago as the first session of the Sixty-first Congress the gentleman from New York believed that the woolen schedule was too high and should be revised?

Mr. PAYNE. He certainly did, never has concealed it, always acknowledged and worked hard to make it lower; and if he could have had the information I think we will have from the Tariff Board in December he would have been enabled to convince his colleague of that fact and revised the wool schedule in that bill——

Mr. FITZGERALD. So the gentleman desires to get this information, not to convince this side of the House that the wool schedule should be lowered, but to convince his own side of the House that could not be convinced without it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Now, if my friend will wait a minute, not to convince our side of the House. We are utterly powerless in regard to changing any schedule in this law. We can not do it. You do not believe the intelligence we can give you on the subject. You go into a caucus, and we can not find anything there stated in that caucus except gross misstatements in regard to the revenues which you did believe and you did not——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman speaks about the caucus——

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). If you would come with an open mind into the House for information, we could convince you by that information you were wrong about this wool bill you have brought in here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the gentleman could not convince that side of the House that the present schedule is wrong, and you could not convince me that my side is wrong——

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman—to give a little more intelligence on the subject and get a little more information—what I was trying to do was to adjust the schedule of a duty at so much per pound on the scoured wool in whatever form it might be brought in instead of a duty which is to-day making a discrimination between scoured wool and the wool in the fleece.

And while I had information which convinced me on the subject, I did not have that full and accurate information which we will have when it comes from the Tariff Board, and which, I think, will convince any gentleman in this House upon the subject that it is not only feasible but right, just, and equitable that we should have a schedule that will be entirely equitable, with a specific duty instead of the discarded, worn-out, and by all the nations of the world utterly repudiated ad valorem duty, which you put all through your wool bill and propose to put through the entire revision of the tariff, so far as you are able.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for 12 years before he attempted to revise the tariff. If he could not get all the information he needed in that time, how long does he think the country ought to wait for him to be informed in order to perform the work devolving upon the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if I could not get all the information needed in 14 years as chairman of the committee, and a longer time as member of the committee, it shows the necessity for hard work on the part of men with sufficient force under them to conduct the investigation in order to get a full and complete knowledge of the tariff. I think with such a report my friend and honored colleague might be instructed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All I have to say is, that since the gentleman could not get that information in 12 years, dogs are very fortunate with the Republican Party in power.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman ought to label that "this is a joke" before he puts it into the RECORD. Perhaps a diagram would help it out. Dogs may be unfortunate that the Republican Party is not in power, but there are 95,000,000 people in the United States that are doubly unfortunate that the Republicans are not in power to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad to stand under this fan, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the number of them will increase.

I listened with interest to both of the gentlemen from New York. I am for this bill. It has the unanimous report of the committee. I think all of us are for it. It will pass by unanimous consent, as it ought to pass. Of course the Pomeranian pup has been with us heretofore, and is still with us, whether its mistress takes it over into Canada and wants to bring it back, being a native of the United States, or not. I suppose under this amendment she could not be taxed. I am here to defend the Pomeranian pup in some cases. In the absence of any other family it is better than no family, in my judgment. [Laughter.] But, then, that is a matter of taste. My friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has had much to say about his colleague. His colleague is perfectly able to take care of himself. As you, not we in the minority, have managed, under the recommendations of our President, to pass the so-called Canadian reciprocity bill, that might be termed a "pact," through the House, without any report from the Tariff Commission, going, as you say, along your lines, but not going as far as you desire, I apprehend that you will manage to pass this bill by unanimous consent. I am for it, I say again, as a Member of the minority, although I am against and was against the bill that you passed, and which will pass, I apprehend, in the Senate by vote of Democratic Senators. I am against it for many reasons. You say it is in harmony with your policies; and, great heavens, how the tears have run down the cheeks of some of the people of the country, and how the great metropolitan press of the country in great headlines has said, "We are one people, the dear Canadians and the dear Americans." How we should fall upon each other's necks and promote harmony and good feeling, and assist them in their material interests in products of the soil, even when they refused the President who negotiated the agreement to have complete free trade in Canadian and American products generally.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. When the doctor, living on the American side, rides across the Canadian border, or, living in Texas, rides across the Mexican border, to see a patient, I am perfectly willing that he shall come back, I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], without paying duty upon the American horse which he rides, for the preservation of the health of the patient and for good feeling. This is real good feeling, real humanity. It does not cost anything. It is not an excuse to drag in a great measure that will impair our revenues many, many million dollars, and as the years come and go will injure one-third of our people, and in the end all our people, at the expense of one-third of our population, developing a country that is now undeveloped at our expense and to their profit.

Now, then, I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], we can stand the Pomeranian pup. Great heavens! The business of this country halts. The public press tell us that by the action of this special session of Congress and the agitation of a change of the revenue laws 60 per cent of the spindles in New England are silent. Business grows less each day on account of the proceedings of this extraordinary session of Congress. I will agree that you are not responsible for being in session, but you are raising the devil with the industries and the prosperity of the country, now that you are here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, there is legislation that might be well enacted. But it seems to me that this whole proceeding and this whole extraordinary session of Congress is a mere play back and forth for a little or a big political position, and 90,000,000 of people are paying the penalty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Just a word in conclusion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I think I will not use that much.

I sympathize with you, gentlemen of the majority. Last Congress you hungered and thirsted for a Tariff Board. You were ready to tackle almost anything that would make confusion when you were in the minority. [Laughter.] Now that we are not responsible and when many of our friends believe in a Tariff Board, except as to Canadian reciprocity and Pomeranian pups, you do not want a Tariff Board. [Laughter.] Then we saw you; and now we see you. We do not recognize you as the same individuals.

Well, it is all proper enough. But, gentlemen, when the books are posted and the settlement comes, as it will come, 90,000,000 of people will not look on unmoved, with business and production halted because consumption halts, and there will be something drop in November, 1912. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, Tennessee has furnished many great statesmen to the Nation, and among them two Speakers of this House—James K. Polk and John Bell. The portrait of John Bell graces the Hall of this Chamber just back of the Speaker's chair, given over to the portraits of the Speakers of this great legislative body. John Bell was the last candidate of the Whig Party for President, then called the Constitutional Union Party. He carried the State of Tennessee in the great struggle of 1860.

I think it will be interesting to the membership of this House to know that there lives in Tennessee a grandson of this great man, and who resembles in features his illustrious grandfather, and not only in physical features, but in ideals and statesman-like characteristics. I have thought that it will be not only interesting but beneficial for us to know the views of this descendant of the great John Bell as to our duties and responsibilities as national lawmakers.

Mr. Speaker, shortly after the election of the junior Senator from Tennessee by the legislature last January his friends and admirers gave a banquet in his honor, and among the gentlemen on the program for speeches was this grandson of John Bell, the Hon. John Bell Keeble, now a citizen of Nashville, Tenn., and one of the ablest and most distinguished members of the bar of his native State. I now send the reading clerk a newspaper report of Mr. Keeble's address on the occasion I have mentioned, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

John Bell Keeble was next introduced.

Mr. Keeble said: To those assembled here, viewing with pleasure the advent of our guest of honor into the service of the State, and to him just leaving his chosen calling for a new field of action, let me declare the dignity and solemnity of such an hour.

Let him who contemplates a consecration of his life to affairs of state, do so not lightly, but reverently. The curse of our institutions is the fact that men rush into public life as though it were a market place in which their intellectual wares may bring them gold or gain, and look upon politics as a game, the chief prize of which is position and power for the victor.

It may not be amiss to turn your thoughts to-night to the story of the consecration of a life to public service that is recorded in the pages of a book which has been the inspiration of more noble actions and greater sacrifices than all the other books the world has treasured.

Samuel, instructed by Jehovah at Bethlehem, in Jesse's home, finds David. David, who at this time had spent his days in keeping his father's sheep. The ceremony incident to his setting apart for public service was as solemn and as reverent as a call to the priesthood.

I am persuaded that this serious dedication of this life to public service left a profound impression upon David's life. It remained with him as he waited the day upon which he was to leave his pastoral calling and lingered with him until he gave up this commission with his breath. It nerved him in his fight with the Philistine; it supported him when he was persecuted by Saul; it aroused him to the acme of military achievement that baffled the enemies of the nation and established it in peace; it sustained him in periods of insurrection and rebellion; it guided him in the maintenance of just and wise government.

This was the corner stone of his character that makes his name the synonym of the greatest glory of his people; that causes his words to be lisped by thousands as they enter the valley of the shadow of death, and has coupled his name with the Savior of mankind—Jesus, Son of David!

NEED OF THE NATION.

What was true then is true now. What Israel needed this State and Nation need. Not money, not brains. There has never been a time when our Nation was so rich in both or either. The cry comes up for men to give themselves to public service in the same spirit that David gave himself to Israel.

There is no life in which men need more the sustaining strength of a deep conviction as to holiness and sacredness of their calling to preserve them from temptations and from falling, than political life.

He who gives himself to the service of the State is entering a career beset with trials and with perils. In fact, the history of the great mass of public servants ends with a tragic chapter.

I rejoice to say that if there may be a few public men who are yet subject to the grosser temptations of gold, they are so scorned and whipped by an enlightened public sentiment that their influence is short-lived, and they are rapidly rendered impotent in the doing of public wrong.

He, however, in public service, who rises to no higher virtue than that he will not sell himself for money, has but learned the alphabet of public morality. The consecrated statesman will not barter the people's offices for public favor to himself, nor will he bribe his constituents with the assets of the State.

The day is not only coming, but is now here, when high-minded men should all declare that patronage distributed to gain either the suffrages of a people or the support of a law-making body for favored measures is as corrupting and more dangerous by reason of its insidiousness than the purchase of such suffrages or support with money.

ONLY ONE STANDARD.

This is one standard, then, I set to-night. Let him who enters public life use the patronage at his disposal solely for the public weal, being unwilling ever to prostitute himself in this respect in order to achieve what seems to be a just and noble end.

The consecrated statesman will keep virgin his intellectual integrity. Perhaps it is not amiss to say that too many men have clamored in causes to which they had given no unreserved indorsement.

Sometimes rejoicing that they could salve their consciences with the patent nostrum that the wisdom of the party to which they belong was greater than their own.

Sometimes our public men read wireless messages from their constituents, these messages informing them of the trend of public sentiment. Learning this, without regard to their own convictions they yield without protest lest they lose their influence and their place.

A proper and decent regard for public sentiment is an element of every character, and men should be willing to yield on many matters to the combined wisdom of their people.

UNWORTHY OF TRUST.

But when it comes to a question of fundamental principle, then he who yields his principle to public sentiment, and profits by it, is unworthy of the perfect trust of any noble people.

I am not unmindful of the fearful strain of such a temptation. Not only position and political preferment are at stake, but oftentimes, indeed, the only apparent method of reasonable earnings seems to be at hazard.

But with all this, who can count the hindrance to the development of the best and truest policies that has been occasioned either by the silence of men who knew or the declamation of men whose lips belied the mind behind them.

The day is nigh at hand when the world will not respect a man who sells his intellectual virtue for office or for power any more than it tolerates a man to-day who sells his conviction for lucre.

The rich and the poor, the great and the small, those who manage great enterprises and those who by the sweat of their brows and brawn and brain make these enterprises possible, stand in need of frank, honest leadership as they have never stood in need of it before.

The consecrated statesman, as I picture him, will lead a strenuous and a dangerous life. Many will be crippled and many will be destroyed in the grim game of political strife.

But those who fall will fall in honor!

There are casualties on both sides. The ashes of the dishonest, the boodler, the practical politician, the trimmer, the demagogue, are preserved in many a storied urn.

It is a battle, after all.

I can see, in my imagination, the battle field at night, after the conflict has quieted. On one side contended an army inspired by love of power and possessions. On the other contended an army inspired by a divine conviction that their cause was just—an army fighting in defense of liberty and country.

Each side contributed its quota of the dead. The moon sheds its pale light on the dreadful and ghastly fruit of carnage.

On this man's face death has stamped his ruling passion of greed and hate. He died in selfish and ignoble battle.

On that man's face death stamped the ruling passion—exalted courage and divine sacrifice.

The striking and dramatic difference between the dead is this: That he who dies for principle and upon whose countenance is stamped this ruling passion of which I have spoken, is not really dead. The best of him survives—a heritage to his people. For after all—

> "To every man upon this earth, death cometh soon or late,
> And how can man die better than facing fearful odds
> For the ashes of his fathers and the temple of his gods."

Then, paraphrasing Macaulay, I say, How can a man in public life die better than facing fearful odds in the defense of his convictions and in the earnest effort to preserve his people from what he believes to be a serious calamity?

So, in public life, look around you at the dead and dying on the political battle field.

To him who sits as guest of honor, choose you now the stamp that your political death will leave upon your face.

This means sacrifice, I know as well as any man. But what a glorious thing it is to know that the sons of men who gave their fortunes and lives as gladly as a greeting, in the days of battle from the period of the Revolution to the terrible Civil War, are brave enough at least to sacrifice an office in order to save the state.

A GLORIOUS FIGHT.

It is a most glorious thing to fight in battle for holy cause. There is no heart in which a spark of manhood lingers that does not palpitate and surge at the story of heroism, inspired by patriotism.

It is more heroic and just as glorious to suffer and die politically for conscience as to die physically for conscience sake.

After all, what a glorious land it is, this land of promise of public service. How happy he ought to be upon whose head the consecration oil is poured, and who feels the spirit of consecrated service descend upon him. In comparison to the glory of such a career, all others—the accumulation of wealth, the pursuit of professional recognition, the discovery of new lands, the application of nature's forces to new and beneficient ends, seem to pale and lose in luster.

The destinies of whole peoples are affected by the thoughts and actions of those engaged in this life.

The safety of the individuals and the preservation of the intangible rights of society are affected by these same things.

NOBLY SUSTAINED.

As one enters upon such a career he is sustained and inspired by the devotion and confidence of thousands of living men and women.

He can turn his thoughts to the past and all the great spirits of that period seem to rise and exhort him to noble things. The pioneers who pierced the forest, the statesmen who made the fabric of government, and soldiers who guarded it, all seem to rise and beckon him on to higher and higher things.

To him in whose honor we have assembled to-night, I say:

You are bound to the State by birth and by traditions that you can neither lightly regard nor easily escape. Even while you grapple with the present and are setting your face to the future, eagerly awaiting the arising of to-morrow's sun.

I am satisfied that the good name of Tennessee conjures you, the glories of the past arouse your noblest emotions, while the needs of the present call you to action.

You are blessed with strength and youth and the confidence of people. Honor has come early to your door.

I trust you may not regard it as presumptuous in me to wish for you that success that comes from consecrated service to the State. A career that will meet the approval of the people of to-day, and the plaudits of the witnesses looking down upon you from the unseen and unknown world. A conduct that will give you the support of your own good conscience; a life that will finally entitle you to a place among those who have blessed mankind by their consecrated statesmanships.

[During the reading of the foregoing, the time of the gentleman from Tennessee having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended to enable the clerk to conclude the reading of the article.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if I may be indulged for a moment just to make a statement, I am informed that that most eloquent speech comes from the grandson of former Speaker Bell. That grandson, I am told, is now the attorney of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. I want to ask the gentlemen upon the other side whether or not this eloquent speech, which is now entombed in the RECORD along with the remarks of the balance of us, is not an insidious effort on the part of a great corporation such as would warrant an investigation by a special committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has asked a question, and I desire to answer it.

Mr. CANNON. I would be very glad to answer any question that the gentleman from Tennessee desires to ask if I have the time, but I have no time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition. I do not want five minutes, but only a minute. I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not in order. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to use two minutes of time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I rose and addressed the Chair before reserving the right to object to the request of the gentleman from Alabama. I did not understand whether the Speaker had recognized me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that four gentlemen rose at the same time, as near as the Chair could see, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] began making a speech, without being recognized by the Chair [laughter], and so the Chair let him go.

Mr. CANNON. For which the gentleman from Illinois is much obliged.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Tennessee undertook to answer the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia as soon as the gentleman from Tennessee is through.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know the object and purpose of the remark by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the former illustrious Speaker of this House. I am satisfied that he does not know Mr. Keeble, or he would not attempt or do anything that would be construed as an attempt to break down the force and wisdom of what that gentleman, Mr. Keeble, said by referring to his occupation. Mr. Keeble is a professor of law in Vanderbilt University, as I am informed, and is also one of the attorneys of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., but I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, that being employed by a railroad company does not necessarily destroy the ideals of a true, honest, sincere American citizen, be he Democrat or Republican.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return. I have hopes of the final saving of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. And I pray as long as the lamp burns my friend from Illinois will receive a full share of its benefits.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, it is entirely fit that after the eloquent sermon read at the instance of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], the gentleman from Illinois should so appropriately and after the ancient fashion open the doors of the church to all concerned. There is at least, however, some incongruity in dealing at one and the same time with the patriotic references of the gentleman from Tennessee and the canine qualities of a Fifth Avenue pup seeking reimportation into the United States. I desire, however, on behalf of one species of this family to speak. I could not quite gather the full report of the Ways and Means Committee, and I hope the gentleman from Alabama and his distinguished associates do not seek to place on the same basis the fox terrier and the possum dog. I have conceived that if a terrier or a St. Bernard or some aristocratic species under the tutelage of Fifth Avenue society should migrate in a steamboat stateroom across the Atlantic and there sojourn for a period of exceeding six months some little financial arrangement should be made at the American port before they again assume their residence in our Republic and proceed to ride upon our fashionable thoroughfares in carriages and automobiles. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

However, Mr. Speaker, it has occurred to me that the fox dog, the coon dog, the rabbit dog, and the possum dog should have a right to return to this country at any time without any embargo, without any tariff, or without any duty, save that of resuming their usual vocation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Illinois that there is about to be some ill-timed legislation on this tariff question, and, inasmuch as we could not hear from the Tariff Board on the legal status of society dogs, I am of the opinion that it should have been referred long since to the Committee on Immigration, so that the Immigration Commission when they traveled in Europe could have looked into the question of the admission into the United States of this new class of emigrants, and no doubt that commission would have unanimously recommended that they be admitted free from both head and tail tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, there is one source of congratulation growing out of this debate and that arose when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] gave to his colleague the statement that he thought the wool schedule was too high and had long so contended. Since this bill and the gentleman's statement deal with the matter of revenue, I desire to present to the House at this time correspondence had with the gentleman from New York in 1910, while he was yet chairman of the Republican Ways and Means Committee. On the 8th of April, 1910, I introduced the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 24257) to provide revenue for the Government, to reduce existing duties, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act an act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, is hereby reenacted with the following changes and modifications: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected upon all dutiable articles, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions, 70 per cent of the rates of duty which are, by the schedules and paragraphs of the dutiable list of said act of July 24, 1897, prescribed: Provided, however, That the rates of duty prescribed in "Schedule F—Tobacco, and manufactures thereof," and "Schedule H—Spirits, wines, and other beverages," and "Schedule L—Silks and silk goods," of act approved July 24, 1897, are hereby reenacted: Provided further, That there shall be levied and collected 50 per cent of the rate of duty imposed and levied on articles named and comprehended in "Schedule C—Metals, and manufactures of," "Schedule I—Cotton manufactures," "Schedule K—Wool and manufactures of wool," and "Schedule M—Pulp, papers, and books," of the act approved July 24, 1897.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

After this bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and had been there for some time, on the 16th of April I undertook to address to the chairman of that committee a modest request as a new Member for a hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means on that bill. It was not a bill for the most sweeping reduction of the tariff. Being then a Republican House and a Republican Senate, I recognized that a bill proposing only a moderate reduction would be more prudent. I desire to read the letter received from Mr. PAYNE, then chairman of that committee, in reply to my request.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Gentlemen of the House will see from the bill and understand that it proposed a reasonable and moderate reduction of the tariff, including the wool schedule, which the gentleman from New York says now he thinks should be reduced and had all along so contended. The letter is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1910.

Hon. S. A. RODDENBERY, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 16th instant received. Having revised the tariff as late as August 5 last, and business conditions throughout the country having improved to an unprecedented extent, the majority of the committee do not propose to continue the agitation of the subject, and therefore will not give you a hearing on the bill which you have proposed. You had ample opportunity a little over a year ago to present your views to this committee. Exhaustive hearings were had on the subjects which are treated of in your bill, and after months of study and deliberation the committee reported on them. I can not see how it would serve any useful purpose to have a hearing on this subject at the present time.

I know of no one except yourself who wants to go back to the Dingley law as a basis for a tariff measure. That law was certainly considered and thoroughly revised in nearly all its schedules. I commend you to a perusal of the evidence taken by the committee at that time, a copy of which you can get on application to the clerk of the committee.

Yours, very truly,

SERENO E. PAYNE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RODDENBERY. If I have the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What was the date of that letter?

Mr. RODDENBERY. April 20, 1910.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was after the passage of the Payne bill?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Nearly a year afterwards and after the idea of the Tariff Commission was promulgated, and when the gentleman in the letter read gave his reason for not taking up the tariff then, he did not undertake to conceal himself and his party behind a Tariff Board, as he now does, because the 5th of November, 1910, had not yet arrived. He referred me to the great satisfaction the Payne law was giving and cited me to the voluminous committee hearings, but when the people of this country touched off his party on the 5th of November last and repudiated the Payne tariff law, and he could no longer hide behind tariff protection, he proceeds to seek now the entrenchments of a Tariff Board. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The record will not disclose that the gentleman from New York was a very ardent advocate of the Tariff Board at that particular time. But now——

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RODDENBERY. With pleasure.

Mr. CULLOP. Is it not true that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] then, as a Member from New York, was voting against the constitution of a tariff board?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The record, I think, will so disclose. And now, when the people of the country have placed the gentleman's party face to face with a reduction of the tariff, on the line of my original bill, and they can no longer resort to the argument that the country indorses the Republican tariff policy, they seek to get a stay of public execution by hiding behind the fiction of tariff legislation based on reports by trust-employed tariff agents.

However, the debate being under the five-minute rule, I can not indulge in further remarks along this line, but, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the pending bill, I think it would well become the Congress, with or without unanimous consent, instead of legislating respecting the reimportation of short-tailed, bull-necked pups, if we directed our attention to taking up the late report of the Immigration Commission and passed a law protecting American citizenship, American interest, and American labor against the vagrancy, crime, and scum of foreign lands. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, may I have two minutes additional time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] asks two minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In my judgment the House, as an emergency measure, might with wisdom at this time, just before the great staple of the Republic goes on the market, report and pass through the House and to the Senate a bill providing for outlawing and striking down the gambling institutions of the country that fix the price of American cotton and American commodities. I might refer to other great measures in which the masses of our countrymen are vitally interested, affecting the prosperity, the happiness of the people, and touching public confidence in the legislative assembly, that we should consider instead of whittling away the time on special reports affecting the legal status of a dog in returning to the Republic after having been temporarily removed to the court of France or to the coronation of King George. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is nearly time for us to get back directly to this bill. I want to take this opportunity to place myself on record in favor of it, because I have learned from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] that if this bill is enacted into law it will enable the owners of poodle dogs and other pet creatures to bring their favorites back into the country after they have taken them out for temporary social purposes.

I have a particular reason, Mr. Speaker, why I want to be on record on this proposition, because I have received the condemnation and the censure of a society—the Society for the Protection of Poodle Dogs in the District of Columbia. [Laughter.]

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I was invited by the young men to deliver an address at a meeting in the building of the Young Men's Christian Association in this city. The notice came by telephone, and I responded immediately and without any preparation, so that I ought not perhaps to have been held strictly accountable for anything I said on that occasion. My audience, however, was composed entirely of men—of young men—and I tried to say something to them that would be of benefit to them in the strife that comes to every man in this life. They were unmarried men and, among other things, I advised them that they ought to get married, and that to be a husband and a father was the noblest ambition of every male human being.

I told them why I believed it was necessary for young men who wanted to be patriotic and do good to their country and to humanity to be married and raise children. I called attention to the fact that many wealthy people were raising more poodle dogs than children, and I told them of an incident that came under my observation when walking down Connecticut Avenue one day, when I saw the door of a residence open—a residence that had cost perhaps a couple of million dollars—and a well-dressed woman came out and there drove up in front of it a carriage with two men in uniform sitting up in front and one man in uniform sitting on the seat in the rear, and as the woman came down the walk those men got down and took off their silk hats and bowed almost to the sidewalk as they opened the carriage door and put her into the carriage. She carried in her arms a beautiful poodle dog, all decked out in ribbons, trinkets, and flowers.

I watched her as they drove down the avenue, and my heart bled in pity for this woman of wealth, who I supposed was childless, and who was therefore compelled to waste her affections on a poodle dog. They had not gone very far, however, until the door of that mansion opened again and a colored woman came out, wheeling a little baby carriage. I crossed the street in order to ascertain exactly how the baby was dressed, and from the way it was dressed and the expensive trinkets and playthings that were about it I came to the conclusion that it was the child of the woman who had gone away caressing the poodle dog while her own flesh and blood was left in the care of a colored servant; and as the colored woman pushed the baby across into the park I felt, for awhile, sorry for the little baby. But I told the young men that, after thinking it over, my sorrow went to the poodle dog, because I believed, under all the circumstances, the baby was in the best company. [Laughter and applause.]

I had no intention, Mr. Speaker, of telling who the family was, but, since I told the young men that it was on Connecticut Avenue, I learned that I had come very nearly identifying the family, because, as I was told afterwards, it was the only baby in that part of Connecticut Avenue, and it was an unwelcome accident. [Laughter.]

But I told these young men that I believed that it was better to live in a sod house, where God's sunshine might come through the windows and shine on the dimpled face of your own little baby that was held in the arms of your own wife, than to live in the lazy luxury of marble halls that had never resounded to the rippling laughter of innocent childhood. I told them that in my younger days, about a year after I was married and had become a proud father, I had been invited to a banquet and had been given the proper subject, and how, under the enthusiasm of the occasion, I had become poetical and had said:

Of all the joys that life can give,
The baby is the best.
I've learned to laugh and cry and sing,
And miss at night my rest.
And when at night from heavenly dreams
I'm brought to earth a spell,
It's all because I think it seems
I've heard that baby yell.
To music of inferior brand,
All clothed in robes of white,
With baby in supreme command,
I march the floor at night.
But when those little eyelids close
In slumber, peaceful, sweet,
I kneel beside my slumbering rose
And kiss her on the cheek;
And kneeling there, in accents mild,
I send up thanks to God,
And ask Him to protect my child
When I'm beneath the sod.
Then fill the flowing goblet well
And drink with joy serene
To her whose charms I love to tell,
My pride, my love, my queen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes longer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, afterwards, the next day, the newspapers, having gotten hold of the story in some way, published the substance of my speech, and in a few days letters began to come to me from society women, poodle-dog owners, not only in the city of Washington but from all over the United States, condemning my speech in finding fault with the love that they had shown for the poodle dog. The society for the protection of poodle dogs condemned me in the severest terms. I was told that the cultured owners of the sacred poodle dog would not stand for any criticism from the plain representative of the common people. From these letters I learned that such a common mortal as I could not be expected to appreciate the affection so worthily bestowed by society women upon the sacred pet. Children might be all right for common people, but they were too inconvenient for women of wealth and high social standing. These attacks were so severe that I hesitated to go alone down Connecticut Avenue after sundown for fear of being attacked by these wronged poodle dogs and their infuriated owners and perhaps wounded, lacerated, and torn to such an extent that I would not make a respectable congressional funeral. One of the papers in the city of Washington sent a reporter, who interviewed some of the leading society ladies of the city of Washington, and with one voice they unanimously condemned me. Mr. Speaker, it became a question with me whether I was going to be able to live in Washington after reading what these society leaders said in condemning me for what I had said about these beloved poodle dogs. I remembered, however, that one thing is always true of a dog, and that is that it never gets in front of an automobile. It always barks at the automobile when it goes by, possibly upon the theory and the belief that the automobile is trying to get away and is afraid.

I remembered also, Mr. Speaker, that the Congress had provided an automobile for the preceding Speaker, and I remembered that the present Speaker had said that he would not use it after he was elected. So it occurred to me that possibly the retiring Speaker might take compassion upon me, as he was about going out of office, and teach me to run that old automobile, so that when it was sold at public auction, as it would have to be, being Government property, if it did not sell for much, I might be able to get the money together to buy it, and then, after having learned how to run it, I could take that automobile and go down through the streets of Washington at the rate of 60 miles an hour, bidding defiance to all the poodle dogs in creation. [Applause and laughter.] So, Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to go on record as doing something in favor of the poodle dog, that I may possibly avert the catastrophe which I fear is about to fall on my troubled head from the avenging wrath of the owners of such animals. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, of course this is the silly season. The dog days are upon us. Consequently we ought not to be too much surprised at what has taken place in the course of this debate. Still, it seems to me, we might for a moment or two get back to the real purpose and object of this bill, which is to correct a manifest error in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. As I look at it, there is no occasion for attempting to inject partisanship into this debate, and I think the efforts of gentlemen on both sides of the Hall to do so are a little bit farfetched. This bill was not drawn, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] very well knows, for the purpose of facilitating the entry of expatriated Pomeranian pups.

It seems that a distinguished Senator in his efforts to protect a domestic industry went much further than he intended when he offered his amendment on the floor of the Senate, and that the present language in the act works in this way. If a man sends a horse abroad to a horse show, for exhibition—a thoroughbred, blooded horse—it becomes necessary for him under the law to pay the regular duty to bring it back to this country. A hackman at Niagara Falls can not drive a passenger across the bridge and drive his horse and vehicle back without paying duty. Of course I know that if only the hackman were considered there would not be much sentiment behind this bill, but now I am going to call the attention of Members of the House to one result of the present legislation which is bound to come home to every one of us, and that is the effect it has upon the circuses.

One circus, I think the Ringling Bros., has made contracts to show in Canada. If they perform their contracts and go over into Canada, it will cost them $75,000 to get back into this country, and that $75,000 would not be paid upon the ferocious animals—the lions and the tigers, and so forth—but upon the domestic animals, and inasmuch as these gentlemen have made these contracts and are bound to go into Canada, we are confronted with the possibility that perhaps they might not want to pay that $75,000 and would stay there, and the youth of this country would be deprived of the opportunity of seeing circuses for evermore. Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the debate has been of such a character that it is likely to go forth to the country that the Ways and Means Committee met in solemn session for the purpose of permitting Pomeranian pups to be brought into this country with their owners.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. There is a serious purpose behind this bill, as the gentleman from New York very well knows.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I yield to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman could not have been in the Chamber during all of my remarks, because I emphasized the fact that the agitation over this Pomeranian pup stopped at the customhouse was responsible for the unanimity of opinion on this bill. I never doubted that the Democratic Members would report a bill to relieve the conditions which actually grew out of an error in the Payne bill and affecting matters that would appeal to the reason of Members on this side of the House; but I contrasted the fact that the committee was unanimous on this bill with the record of the committee in the last session of Congress, when the chairman even refused to call a meeting of the committee to consider a bill to place meat on the free list, and I also emphasized the fact that at last something had been discovered that appealed to the sympathies of the Republicans in the House to favor this legislation.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would not have yielded to the gentleman from New York if I had known he was going to attempt to burn up the gentleman from Ohio. I am not charging the gentleman from New York with any desire to do anything but to embarrass the gentlemen on the other side. I know that nothing gives him more pleasure than an opportunity to do that, but in his desire to do that I do not wish it to go before the country that we are legislating here solely on Pomeranian dogs. There is a good reason why this measure should pass, and it is of sufficient importance to warrant the Committee on Ways and Means in considering it and reporting the bill to this House for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Debate on this section has been exhausted. The gentleman from New York withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, is all time exhausted, so that I can not ask the chairman of the committee a question or two? I have been waiting patiently for an opportunity.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that if the gentleman will allow the Clerk to read I will be glad to answer questions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is in anticipation of the reading, and I think it will save further questions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can offer an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely wish to ask a question or two in reference to the phraseology of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The trouble about that is no one has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, then I move to strike out the last word. What question does the gentleman desire to ask?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill that is new except the last paragraph, beginning on line 8, page 3, "and providing further that cattle, horses, sheep, and other domestic animals," and so forth, "straying across the boundary line," and so forth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that the bill was prepared in conformity with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury to make it conform with the recent decision of the Tariff Board, and the change in the law is in the second line of the Payne bill, section 500, where the words "not including animals" are stricken out, and the last paragraph is added on the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Merely to permit the return of animals that may stray over the border—cattle, sheep, and so forth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not only animals that might stray across the border, but express companies doing business across the border can not drive their express wagons back and forth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it cover the return of such animals as might be sent by farmers along the border in Texas, on the northern border——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Who might negotiate for pasturage in Canada or Mexico?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will examine the bill he will see it says, provided the animals are returned within six months.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This bill simply restores the law to the condition in which it was before the enactment of the Payne law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, it puts a limitation of six months.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Paragraph 492 contains a clause which would seem to cover the provision which is inserted in the bill brought in by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I could not quite get it from the reading of the report, and therefore I would like to inquire if the decision of the court makes it necessary to pass this new provision, and does paragraph 492 fail to give sufficient scope for the purpose?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I had the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read from the desk. He states that it does require this additional legislation, and the legislation was offered on his suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Debate on this section is closed, and the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is withdrawn. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The motion was agreed to.

NATHANIEL T. CRUTCHFIELD, AND MRS. H. M'KENNA KOLKMEYER, DECEASED.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 222.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $300 to Nathaniel T. Crutchfield for expert services rendered in connection with the preparation of a comparative statement of the Rules of the Fifty-third Congress and the Rules of the Sixty-first Congress for the use of the Sixty-second Congress; and that there shall be paid out of said fund the sum of $200 to Mrs. H. McKenna Kolkmeyer for clerical, stenographic, typewriting, and proof-reading services rendered in connection with the preparation of said comparative statement for the use of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (H. Rept. 60).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 222, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption.

This resolution provides for the payment out of the contingent fund of the House of the sum of $300 to Nathaniel T. Crutchfield, and $200 to Mrs. H. McKenna Kolkmeyer for services rendered.

Mr. Crutchfield rendered expert services in connection with the preparation of the comparative statement of the Rules of the Fifty-third Congress and the Rules of the Sixty-first Congress.

Mrs. Kolkmeyer rendered clerical assistance to Mr. Crutchfield and those with whom he was laboring.

It was necessary that the Rules Committee have assistance in order that the House have no delay awaiting the preparation of rules.

Both Mr. Crutchfield and Mrs. Kolkmeyer rendered valuable assistance, and believing the amounts designated a reasonable compensation and this a proper resolution we have recommended its adoption.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, since the report on this resolution Mrs. Kolkmeyer has died. I therefore offer the following amendment:

In line 8, after the word "to," insert the words "the legal representatives of"; and, after the word "Kolkmeyer," in the same line, add the word "deceased."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, after the word "to," insert the words "the legal representatives of"; and, after the word "Kolkmeyer," in the same line, insert the word "deceased."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the title amended in the resolution just passed, so as to add, after the words "Mrs. H. McKenna Kolkmeyer," the word "deceased." I wish to change the title of the resolution to correspond with the amendment, adding the word "deceased" after the word "Kolkmeyer."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks to have the title of the resolution amended in accordance with the fact. Without objection, it will be so done.

THE DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 30 minutes in reply to the speech made last Wednesday by Mr. HENRY of Texas. (H. Res. 221.)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes, in reply to the speech recently made on the Diplomatic Service by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the request, but I would like the gentleman to couple with it the proposition that I may be allowed 10 minutes to reply to him if I should see proper.

Mr. KAHN. I certainly would like to have the gentleman from Texas accorded some time. It will probably take me fully half an hour to make the reply. I think it took the gentleman from Texas half an hour to make his speech. I will therefore modify my request, Mr. Speaker, and make it that the gentleman from Texas and myself be accorded an hour.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from California how that hour is to be divided, so that the Chair can put the question.

Mr. KAHN. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that I be allowed 40 minutes. I think I can absolutely conclude in that time. Then the gentleman from Texas will be allowed 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] asked for an hour, to be divided 40 minutes to himself and 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the gentleman from California to answer the speech recently made by the gentleman from Texas on the Diplomatic Service, and the gentleman from Texas to answer his speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Are you going to have a joint debate? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from California is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a week ago, on the 5th day of this month, my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], chairman of the important Committee on Rules of this House, regaled us with a well-prepared speech, in which he voiced the opinion that there was too much glitter in our modern American diplomacy; and, in a burst of perfervid oratory, he expressed the hope that there might be an early return to the democratic simplicity of the formative period of our republican Government.

Democratic simplicity, forsooth! Why, if my good friend had drunk deep of the Pierian Spring on this subject of American diplomacy instead of having just sipped a drop or two, he would have discovered that this vaunted simplicity is little more than a pure myth—a figment of the imagination that had no actual existence.

At the very outset I make the assertion that at no time in the history of the Republic have the American ambassadors or ministers to foreign courts been less obsequious, been dressed in simpler clothes, resorted so little to finesse and chicane, conducted more important and far-reaching negotiations with a candor and directness that has never been excelled in our foreign policy than has the modern American diplomat under the leadership and guidance of the lamented John Hay and the able and distinguished ELIHU ROOT and Philander C. Knox. And I say further that at no time in our country's history has American diplomacy achieved greater results than during the period these three distinguished Americans have presided over the destinies of our Department of State.

My good friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] begins his onslaught on our diplomacy with a recital of the sailing of Winthrop's expedition and quotes from Green, the English historian, to the effect that for 10 or 11 years after the sailing of the Mayflower 20,000 Englishmen had found refuge in the west. Then, in a burst of splendid oratory, he says:

Driven by a brutal abuse of royal power invading their individual rights as citizens, these sturdy men thus crossed the Atlantic to find homes in the wilderness amongst us.

I never knew before that we were here when Gov. Winthrop landed. It had probably escaped the attention of historians heretofore, but if we were here we were delighted to have those sturdy old pioneers of American civilization "in the wilderness amongst us." [Laughter.] Gradually sturdy citizens of other European countries expatriated themselves by thousands, some to escape persecution, religious and otherwise, some in a spirit of adventure, some in the hope of bettering their condition in life. Joining the Englishmen of whom the gentleman from Texas has spoken and their descendants they helped to redeem the wilderness and converted it into the homes and habitations of a simple, frugal, liberty-loving people. There were about 3,000,000 of these Americans in the original thirteen Colonies at the beginning of the Revolutionary War; and, as my friend from Texas has stated, these people of simple tastes sent their agents to the various courts of Europe to enlist the sympathy and, if possible, to obtain the active support of the monarchs, the princes, and the potentates of Europe.

Benjamin Franklin was the first and foremost of these agents. Our countrymen will always revere his memory for the eminent success he achieved at the French court. Through his influence, the French Government sent a minister to the Continental Congress in 1778. His name was Gerard. The Members of the Continental Congress were undoubtedly men imbued with the true spirit of democratic simplicity. In 1778, when M. Gerard was about to present his credentials to them, they had cast off their allegiance to the British Crown; they had discarded the trappings of royalty; and yet the contemplated visit occasioned them no small degree of embarrassment. It was at once fitting and proper that he be received with the formality required by the occasion, and so the matter was referred to a committee of three, composed of Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia; Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts; and Gouverneur Morris, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Speaker, if we have writ our annals true, these gentlemen were the very essence of democratic simplicity. When they finally presented their report to the House, which report turned largely on mere points of etiquette, it was discussed by the Congress for five whole days. Upon his arrival the minister was received with a degree of formality that can not be read at this late day without occasioning something of a smile. It was provided that the accredited representative of the French monarch should be called on by two Members of the Congress on his arrival, who were also to conduct him into the august presence of the entire Congress. Let me read the program for his reception:

At the time he is to receive his audience the two Members shall again wait upon him in a coach belonging to the States, and the person first named of the two shall return with the minister plenipotentiary or envoy in the coach, giving the minister the right hand and placing himself on the left with the other Member on the first seat. When the minister plenipotentiary or envoy is arrived at the door of the Congress Hall, he shall be introduced to his chair by the two Members, who shall stand at his left hand.

[Laughter.]

When the minister is introduced to his chair by the two Members, he shall sit down.

[Laughter.]

His secretary shall then deliver to the President the letter of his sovereign, which shall be read and translated by the Secretary of Congress. Then the minister shall be announced, at which time the President, the House, and the minister shall rise together.

[Laughter.]

The minister shall then bow to the President and the House and they to him.

[Laughter.]

The minister and the President shall then bow to each other and be seated, after which the House shall sit down.

[Laughter.]

The minister shall deliver his speech standing. The President and the House shall sit while the minister is delivering his speech. The House shall rise, and the President shall deliver the answer standing. The minister shall stand while the President delivers his answer. Having spoken and being answered, the minister and President shall bow to each other, at which time the House shall bow, and then the minister shall be conducted home in the manner in which he was brought to the House.

[Laughter.]

It strikes me that as a specimen of democratic simplicity there was considerable bowing and scraping on this auspicious occasion. [Laughter.] I believe that it is customary at most of the royal courts of Europe to require three bows, or "reverences" as they are called, from the individual who approaches the royal presence. The first is given at the entrance door of the audience chamber, the second about the center of the room, and the third when one reaches the presence of the royal personage. I believe, too, that it is necessary on leaving the royal presence to back out as gracefully as you can with your face always turned toward the monarch [laughter], for it would be improper, so it is claimed, to turn one's back on the anointed ruler.

I wonder if M. Gerard, likewise, had to crawl out backward like a crab when making his exit from the Continental Congress. [Laughter.] At this late day the whole program seems an absurd attempt to copy court etiquette, and does not bear out the assumption that the founders of the Government were entirely oblivious of the pomp and ceremonials that would not comport to-day with the democratic simplicity of our own times. In those good old democratic days our ministers had to resort to many devious ways to accomplish results in the fields of diplomacy. Silas Dean wrote home from France to the Continental Congress requesting that some products of the Colonies be forwarded to him to be given to Queen Marie Antoinette as presents to secure her royal influence. He wrote:

DECEMBER 3, 1776.

The Queen is fond of parade, and, I believe, wishes for war, and is our friend. She loves riding on horseback. Could you send me a fine Narragansett horse or two?

[Laughter.]

The money would be well laid out. Rittenhouse's aviary, or Arnold's collection of insects, a phæton of American make and a pair of bay horses—a few barrels of apples, walnuts, cranberries, butternuts, etc., would be great curiosities.

[Laughter.]

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas decries the fact that men of large means are invariably selected to fill the responsible diplomatic posts abroad. Let me say to him that from the very outset the pay to our representatives abroad has been entirely inadequate, and at every period of our country's history the men who have represented us on diplomatic missions have been compelled to use their private means in order to maintain the dignity of their positions and to uphold the honor of their country. Thus Thomas Jefferson, when minister to France, wrote to the Continental Congress and to his own personal friends that it was impossible for him to live on his salary. He suggested a more liberal appropriation. Writing to John Jay, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, he said:

It is the usage here—and I suppose at all courts—that a minister shall establish his house in the first instance. If this is done out of his salary he will be a twelfth-month absent without a copper to live on. * * * My furniture, carriage, and apparel are all plain, yet they have cost me more than a year's salary.

John Adams complained to the Congress of the Confederation in 1785 that his salary at Paris and The Hague was insufficient to enable him to make a decent appearance at court and in society. He said truthfully that "extreme parsimony is not economy," and he told the Congress that his expenses had "pinched and straitened him confoundedly."

It goes without saying that if our representatives abroad are to accept courtesies they are compelled to return courtesies. John Quincy Adams, probably the most experienced of all our diplomats, wrote to the State Department, in 1815, that—

The annual salary of an American minister is insufficient to support a man with a family—I say not in the style of high official rank, but in the decency becoming a private gentleman.

His predecessor, William Pinckney, an exceptionably able American diplomat in his day, had to relinquish the English mission, and in asking to be relieved wrote to President Madison as follows:

Upon a recent inspection of my private affairs, it appears that my pecuniary means are more completely exhausted than I had supposed, and that to be honest I must hasten home.

The compensation—as it is oddly called—allotted by the Government to the maintenance of its representative abroad is a pittance, which no economy, however rigid, or even mean, can render adequate. It never was adequate I should think; but it is now, especially in London, far short of that just indemnity for unavoidable expenses which every Government, no matter what its form, owes to its servants.

I have, in fact, been a constant and progressive loser, and at length am incapable of supplying the deficiencies of the public allowance. These deficiencies have been hitherto supplied by the sacrifice of my own capital in America, or by my credit, already pushed as far as the remnant of that capital will justify, and I fear somewhat further. I can not, as an honorable man, with my eyes open to my situation, push it further, and of course I must retire.

William C. Rives, our minister to France during the Polk administration, advised the State Department that—

The burden becomes insurmountable to any but a man of very large fortune, to which class few of our public men in America belong, and to which it is certainly not the policy of our institutions to confine the performance of high public trusts.

James Monroe, who at various times had been a minister abroad, the Secretary of State, and the President of his country, urged Congress during his administration to make a more liberal appropriation for the Diplomatic Service. Among other things, he said:

A minister can be useful only by filling his place with credit in the diplomatic corps and in the corresponding circle of society in the country in which he resides, which is the best in every country. By taking the proper ground, if he possesses the proper qualifications and is furnished with adequate means, he will become acquainted with all that passes, and from the highest and most authentic sources. * * * Deprive him of the necessary means to sustain this ground, separate him from the circle to which he belongs, and he is reduced to a cipher.

It will be noticed that President Monroe dwelt upon the fact that not alone must a minister fill his place with credit in the diplomatic corps, but also in the corresponding circle of society in the country to which he is assigned, which society is always the best in every country.

Surely, my good friend from Texas must realize that in these days of expensive and even lavish entertainment it requires still greater means for a representative of our Government abroad to fittingly and properly entertain in that circle of society which the position he occupies compels him to enter.

And so I could give innumerable instances where our Presidents and our Secretaries of State from the very beginning of the Government to the present day have urged upon the Congress the absolute necessity for increasing the salary of our representatives abroad. Congress, however, has not seen fit to do so, and I think I can truthfully say that our salaries to our diplomatic representatives abroad at the present time are proportionately less than they were at the very beginning of the Government. From a report made by Mr. Morris, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and his assistant secretary, Mr. du Ponceau, to Congress in 1782, it appears that Franklin, Jay, and Adams each received in that year a salary as minister abroad amounting to the sum of $11,111\frac{1}{9}$. When one considers that the purchasing power of money in those days was infinitely greater than it is to-day one is compelled to admit that we have distinctly retrograded in this matter of adequate compensation.

The gentleman from Texas deplores the fact that Dr. Eliot, of Harvard, had to decline the ambassadorship to England on account of financial poverty. Let me assure the gentleman that during his beloved days of democratic simplicity the eminent and able John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, for similar reasons had to decline the mission to France in 1819, and later, in 1845, the mission to England.

My good friend from Texas, in speaking of the recent coronation festival in London, referred to what he called the "wild scramble for kingly favors." Does he know that one of his cherished heroes of the Revolutionary period, John Jay, was similarly accused? Mr. Jay was sent as a special envoy by President Washington to London to negotiate a treaty with England concerning some grave questions then in dispute, which threatened to break off the diplomatic relations between the two countries. The treaty is known in history as the Jay-Grenville treaty, or the British treaty of 1794. That treaty contained the germ of that policy which has fructified into the "modern era of arbitration"—that policy which in our own day is receiving the commendation of the great masses of our citizens. Its original reception in the United States, however, was none too cordial. Mr. Jay was denounced in placards pasted on the dead walls of Richmond, Va., as an "arch traitor," and one of the publications of that period excoriated him for having kissed the Queen's hand. With that kiss, so it was claimed, he "betrayed away the rights of man and the liberty of America." [Laughter.] So that my good friend from Texas will note that even in 1794 an envoy extraordinary of the United States was also charged with having made a scramble, not for kingly but for queenly favors. And since that alleged event happened at an early period of democratic simplicity, it may be inferred that he may have set the pace which the more recent envoys, to whom my friend from Texas has referred with such indignation, have followed.

Democratic simplicity, forsooth! I wonder what my good friend from Texas had in mind when he referred to the democratic simplicity of our earlier diplomacy. Did he have in mind the instance referred to by John T. Morse, jr., in his "Thomas Jefferson" (American Statesmen series), in which the reception of the English minister, Anthony Merry, is described in this language:

When Mr. Merry, the British minister, was to be presented, and went "in full official costume" at the appointed day and hour, in company with Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, to the presidential mansion, he was astonished by a scene which he described as follows:

"On arriving at the hall of audience we found it empty, at which Mr. Madison seemed surprised, and proceeded to an entry leading to the President's study. I followed him, supposing the introduction was to take place in the adjoining room. At this moment Mr. Jefferson entered the entry at the other end, and all three of us were packed in this narrow space, from which, to make room, I was obliged to back out. In this awkward position my introduction to the President was made by Mr. Madison. Mr. Jefferson's appearance soon explained to me that the general circumstances of my reception had not been accidental, but studied. I, in my official costume, found myself, at the hour of reception he had himself appointed, introduced to a man as the President of the United States not merely in an undress, but actually standing in slippers down at the heels, and both pantaloons, coat, and underclothes indicative of utter slovenliness and indifference to appearances, and in a state of negligence actually studied."

Does the gentleman from Texas justify the action of President Jefferson on that occasion? Is that what he means by Democratic simplicity? I apprehend that even Mr. Jefferson's greatest admirers can find no extenuation for this evident discourtesy to the duly accredited minister of a foreign power.

Democratic simplicity, forsooth! In the early days of our history our diplomatic positions were all too often tendered as a reward for political services. The Diplomatic Service was the ark of refuge for the "lame ducks" of the earlier period of our national existence. Many excellent gentlemen also sought these diplomatic positions because it afforded an opportunity for foreign travel at the expense of the Government. It was not an unusual thing for a representative of this Government to absent himself from his post for many months at a time, to the great detriment of the interests of the American people, and still draw his salary.

For instance, in the early months of the administration of Andrew Jackson, John Randolph, of Virginia, was offered and accepted the mission to Russia. In Henry Adams's "Life of John Randolph" (American Statesmen series) he says:

He sailed in June, 1830.

He had been appointed in September, 1829, and was promptly confirmed. Under the rule then existing his salary commenced from the date of his confirmation.

He remained 10 days at his post, then passed near a year in England, and returned home in October, 1831; drew $21,407 from the Government with which to pay off his old British debt. This act of Roman virtue, worthy of the satire of Juvenal, still stands as the most flagrant bit of diplomatic jobbery in the annals of the United States Government.

Is the gentleman from Texas proud of this incident that occurred in our Diplomatic Service during the days of Democratic simplicity? Could such a thing happen at this period of our history? Would it not bring upon the shoulders of the offender both obloquy and opprobrium? And should there not have been a select committee of investigation so that they could have fully exploited this public scandal? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I spoke of the simplicity of costume of the present-day American diplomat at foreign courts. Does the gentleman from Texas recall the days of "fuss and feathers," when nearly all our early ministers and envoys abroad, under instructions from the Secretaries of State, were compelled to appear in court costume at public functions? Democratic simplicity, forsooth!

At the treaty of Ghent, negotiated in 1814 between this country and England, our five commissioners—Albert Gallatin, James A. Bayard, John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, and Jonathan Russell—appeared in costume, which was thus described:

A blue coat lined with white silk; straight standing cape, embroidered with gold, single breasted, straight or round buttonholes slightly embroidered; buttons plain, or, if they can be had, with the artillerists' eagle stamped upon them, i. e., an eagle flying with a wreath in its mouth, grasping lightning in one of its talons; cuffs embroidered in the manner of the cape; white cassimere breeches; gold knee buckles; white silk stockings and gold or gilt shoe buckles; a three-cornered chapeau-de-bras, not so large as those used by the French, nor so small as those of the English—

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

a black cockade, to which lately an eagle has been attached; sword, etc., corresponding.

Subsequently in 1817, during the administration of James Monroe, the State Department issued a circular wherein this uniform was adopted for our diplomatic ministers. The secretaries of legation were to have the same costume, with the exception that their coats were to have less embroidery than that of the minister. The instructions went on to say:

It is usual at all European courts on what are called gala days, such as birthdays of the sovereign, marriages of princes of his family, and other extraordinary occasions, for the foreign ministers, as well as other persons of distinction connected with the court, to appear in uniforms more splendid with embroidery than upon occasions of ordinary levees, drawing-rooms, and diplomatic circles. A decent respect for the usages of the courts and a suitable compliance with forms there established make it proper that the minister of the United States should adopt this custom and wear on those occasions a coat similar to that above described, but embroidered round the skirts and down the breasts, as well as at the cuffs and cape, all the other parts of the dress remaining the same; the coats to be distinguished as the great and the small uniform. There should be a white ostrich feather or plumet in the minister's hat, not standing erect but sewed round the brim.

All the persons attached to the legation wear the same uniform as the secretary and need to have only one.

Oh, the democratic simplicity of that white ostrich feather! Oh, the democratic simplicity of that three-cornered hat, not quite so large as the French nor so small as the English! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In 1823 President John Quincy Adams sent out engraved designs of the uniform to be worn by ministers of the United States at foreign courts on occasions when full dress was required.

The uniform adopted under the administration of President Jackson was a little more simple, as follows:

A black coat with a gold star on each side of the collar, near its termination; the under clothes to be black, blue, or white, at the option of the wearer; a three-cornered chapeau-de-bras; a black cockade and eagle; and a steel-mounted sword with a white scabbard.

But eventually, on June 1, 1853, Gov. Marcy, the Secretary of State under President Pierce, in the spirit of real, bona fide democratic simplicity, issued a circular which cut the Gordian knot of ridiculous convention and for the first time prescribed the "simple dress of an American gentleman." It was in this language:

In addition to the "personal instructions to the diplomatic agents of the United States in foreign countries," the following are hereafter to be observed: In performing the ceremonies observed upon the occasion of his reception the representative of the United States will conform, as far as is consistent with a just sense of his devotion to republican institutions, to the customs of the country wherein he is to reside and with the rules prescribed for representatives of his rank; but the department would encourage, as far as practicable without impairing his usefulness to his country, his appearance at court in the simple dress of an American citizen. Should there be cases where this can not be done, owing to the character of the foreign government, without detriment to the public interest, the nearest approach to it compatible with the due performance of his duties is earnestly recommended. The simplicity of our usages and the tone of feeling among our people is much more in accordance with the example of our first and most distinguished representative at a royal court than the practice which has since prevailed. It is to be regretted that there was ever any departure in this respect from the example of Dr. Franklin. History has recorded and commended this example, so congenial to the spirit of our political institutions. The department is desirous of removing all obstacles to a return to the simple and unostentatious course which was deemed so proper and was so much approved in the earliest days of the Republic. It is our purpose to cultivate the most amicable relations with all countries, and this we believe can be effectually done without requiring our diplomatic agents abroad to depart in this respect from what is suited to the general sentiments of our fellow citizens at home. All instructions in regard to what is called diplomatic uniform, or court dress, being withdrawn, each of our representatives in other countries will be left to regulate this matter according to his own sense of propriety and with a due respect to the views of his Government as herein expressed.

That, if my friend from Texas will permit me, was the beginning of true democratic simplicity in the matter of dress so far as our diplomatic service was concerned. Many of our newspapers in this country warmly applauded Gov. Marcy for the stand he had taken in favor of this sensible departure. The discussion that followed its promulgation developed friends on either side of the question. William H. Trescott, of South Carolina, who was one of the greatest international lawyers of his period, the author of a diplomatic history of the United States, and, subsequently, an Assistant Secretary of State under Buchanan, wrote a letter to Senator Andrew P. Butler upon the subject, which reads as follows:

* * * * * * *

It is true that the circular of Mr. Marcy differs in scarcely any material points from the uniform tenor of the Government's former instructions, and that the exaggerated approbation of a large portion of the radical press of the country is calculated to injure the effect of these instructions, judicious in themselves and published with the quiet propriety of ordinary official communications. To represent the Secretary of State as a heroic tailor, inspired with a fierce zeal for Quaker reform, to deprive the American eagle of its heraldic thunderbolt and substitute in its terrible talons a gigantic pair of shears, to melt up in the furnace of popular indignation the tawdry glory of gold lace and embroidery, strikes the imagination, perhaps, of an excitable people. But we may still be permitted to doubt whether after all Mr. Sandford's appearance at the Tuileries "in plain citizen's dress" will be considered by impartial history as the next most important diplomatic event to the solution of the Turkish question. The truth is that the fussy and ludicrous comments of a portion of the press upon so simple a matter as a change of dress is a more painful exhibition of puerility than any conformity with any extravagance of official uniform. Once let it be understood that the American minister is to appear amid a crowd of laced and gilded dresses in a plain black coat, and that coat becomes as distinct an uniform as if he wore the stars embroidered on his breast and the stripes on his breeches. It is simply a matter of national taste, and the least said about it the better.

* * * * * * *

It will be noted that "the simple dress of an American citizen," under Secretary Marcy's circular, was to be worn whenever it could be done without detriment to the public interest, but in 1867 Congress completed the reform by passing a law, which later became section 1688 of the Revised Statutes, and which reads:

No person in the Diplomatic Service of the United States shall wear any uniform or official costume not previously authorized by Congress.

Secretary Marcy in his circular referred to the fact that our first and most distinguished representative at a royal court, Dr. Franklin, set an example of simplicity in his court dress. There is no doubt that the general impression prevails that our first ambassador to the court of Louis XVI was dressed in the simplest fashion, but Schuyler in his American Diplomacy makes this observation:

It is now well known that this (Dr. Franklin's appearance at the French court in simple dress) was not owing to any love of simplicity on the part of Franklin, but merely that on a certain occasion his presence was so much desired at court when he had no clothes in which he considered it fit to appear that he was requested to come in whatever he happened to be wearing at the moment.

It seems almost pathetic to have our ideals of democratic simplicity thus rudely shattered. [Laughter.]

Dr. Edward Everett Hale in referring to the court uniform of the great diplomatist states that he had a portrait painted of himself which he gave to the bride of his nephew as a wedding present, and which depicted him in a blue silk uniform embroidered with gold and wearing a wig. It may be of interest in passing to state that some of the buttons of the Doctor's court uniform may still be seen in one of the cases in the library of the State Department.

When Secretary Marcy's circular reached the legations in Europe and was given publicity court circles immediately became fluttered with excitement. The newspapers of that period heaped their ridicule upon the Government of the United States. Mr. Buchanan was then our minister in London. He took up the matter with the English master of ceremonies, Maj. Gen. Sir Edward Cust, and announced that it was his intention to wear "the simple dress of an American citizen" at court, unless the Queen herself should show a disposition to have him appear in costume. Sir Edward announced that his Queen would probably receive the American minister at court in any dress that the minister desired to wear, but that it would be disagreeable to his sovereign if the American minister were to depart from established usage.

He also intimated that Mr. Buchanan could not expect to be invited to court balls or to court dinners, at which functions everybody appeared in costume. Mr. Buchanan was one of our distinguished diplomats referred to by the gentleman from Texas in his speech of July 5. The reply of Gen. Cust displeased him greatly, and in writing to the Secretary of State, Mr. Marcy, Mr. Buchanan suggested that he would probably "be placed socially in Coventry on this question of dress," because if he failed to be invited to the Queen's functions, such as balls and dinners, he would also be ostracized at similar functions given by the courtiers of Her Majesty, and that this ostracism would prevent him from having the opportunity of cultivating those relations which were essential for the purposes of information and diplomatic business.

My friend from Texas must realize from this incident that an American envoy, to be of real service to his country, must be prepared to accept invitations to the social functions given not alone by royalty, but by the courtiers who surround royalty. James Monroe years before had enunciated a similar doctrine.

The matter of dining was declared by Lord Palmerston to be the very life and soul of diplomacy, and some of our own foreign representatives have admitted that hospitality plays no insignificant part in the career of the successful minister.

In his delightful satire on "Snobs," William Makepeace Thackery tells the story of a dinner given by the Chief Galoongee of the Porte at Constantinople to the English and the Russian agents who were separately negotiating an important piece of business for their respective countries with the Sultan's Government. Each of the two ambassadors tried to win the influence of the Galeongee. The latter, who was said to have been an enormous eater, placed before his guests a lamb dressed in its wool, stuffed with prunes, garlic, asafetida, capsicums, and other condiments, and it is stated to have been the most abominable mixture that ever mortal smelt or tasted. The English representative, in the language of Thackery, concludes the story thus:

The Galeongee ate of this hugely; and, pursuing the eastern fashion, insisted on helping his friends right and left, and when he came to a particularly spicy morsel, would push it with his own hands into his guests' very mouths.

I never shall forget the look of poor Diddloff, when his excellency, rolling up a large quantity of this into a ball, and exclaiming, "Buk buk" (it is very good), administered the horrible bolus to Diddloff. The Russian's eyes rolled dreadfully as he received it; he swallowed it with a grimace that I thought must precede a convulsion, and seizing a bottle next him, which he thought was sauterne, but which turned out to be French brandy, he drank off nearly a pint before he knew his error. It finished him; he was carried away from the dining room almost dead, and laid out to cool in a summer house on the Bosphorus.

When it came to my turn, I took down the condiment with a smile, said "Bismillah," licked my lips with easy gratification, and, when the next dish was served, made up a ball myself so dexterously, and popped it down the old Galeongee's mouth with so much grace that his heart was won. Russia was put out of court at once, and the treaty of Kabobanople was signed. As for Diddloff, all was over with him; he was recalled to St. Petersburg, and Sir Roderick Murchison saw him under No. 3967, working in the Ural Mines.

While Thackeray points his own moral, I think a more appropriate one is, "When in Rome do as Romans do." That policy leads to diplomatic success.

That is undoubtedly the policy our envoys were pursuing in the English capital during the recent coronation festivities. And yet my friend from Texas, in his speech the other day, almost exploded with indignation because he saw a newspaper account of a royal procession which was witnessed by our special ambassador, Mr. John Hays Hammond, and Mrs. Hammond and a goodly number of the courtiers that attend their majesties, the King and Queen.

According to the teachings of those stanch apostles of democratic simplicity, James Monroe and James Buchanan, our special envoy was admirably fulfilling one of the important purposes of his mission.

The newspaper account in question goes on to say that the incident which so annoyed my good friend occurred at Stratton House, the official residence of our special ambassador. As was to be expected, a large American flag floated to the breeze from the roof of the building. King George and Queen Mary when they passed gave a look of recognition to our ambassador and those assembled in the house and exchanged salutations with them.

Did it occur to my good friend from Texas that the salutation given to our ambassador was a salutation given not to him as an individual but as the representative of the entire American people? [Applause on the Republican side.] An ambassador is said to represent the person of his sovereign. In the United States the people are the sovereign, and the ambassador represents the great body of American citizens. When the King and Queen of England, looking up at Stratton House, beheld the Stars and Stripes and saw the American ambassador seated beneath its folds, they showed that measure of courtesy to the American people which the American people had naturally expected of their majesties. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am surprised that my friend from Texas should have looked upon this incident in such a narrow and personal light.

Mr. Speaker, I know Mr. Hammond. He is a San Franciscan by birth. His parents were California pioneers. He is a college-bred gentleman, and to-day stands in the front rank of his chosen profession. He has made an eminent success of his life. He has amassed his own fortune. He has been thrown into business relationship with men of affairs all over the world. He is a true democratic citizen of the United States in the broadest sense. Mrs. Hammond is a fair daughter of the State of Mississippi. I know that neither of them would transcend the bounds of good breeding, and I believe that when my friend from Texas shall, in calmer moments, consider these matters of which he has spoken he will admit to himself that his criticisms were unfounded and entirely gratuitous.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid, our duly accredited ambassador to the Court of St. James, has occupied his post since 1905 with credit to himself and honor to his country. He is a gentleman and a scholar of broad culture, and has won a distinguished niche in the Diplomatic Service of his country. He is deservedly popular in the country to which he has been assigned, and his scholarly addresses, delivered on many public occasions in England, have never transgressed the rules of propriety or that salutary order of the Department of State which has come down to us from the very beginning of our Government, and which prohibits the public discussion of American political questions abroad by our diplomatic representatives.

My friend from Texas has attacked this gentleman, it seems to me, for the express purpose of lauding a former ambassador to England, the late Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware. It is not pleasant to unearth the skeletons of the past, but let me remind the distinguished gentleman that this House discussed for several days resolutions of censure of Mr. Bayard, because, as an American ambassador, he himself had entirely disregarded those time-honored instructions against making political speeches in the land to which he had been accredited which the same Mr. Bayard, as Secretary of State, had so often laid down to newly appointed American diplomats as their rule of action while abroad. The debate on the resolutions was spirited and acrimonious. Even some of Mr. Bayard's friends were willing to admit that his utterances at Boston, England, and before the Edinburgh Philosophical Society were indiscreet, to say the least. To my mind it did not comport with the dignity of our foreign representative to criticize his own Government abroad by telling his auditors that we are often a violent people and that it takes a real man to govern us. Let me read a brief extract from the speech of Hon. Robert G. Cousins, of Iowa, delivered in this House on the 18th day of March, 1896. During the discussion of the resolutions, Mr. Cousins said:

The charge on which this resolution rests is not denied. It is, in fact, admitted. The answer of the President to the inquiry of the House of Representatives contains both speeches of Mr. Bayard that are complained of.

The first speech, delivered at Boston, England, is reported in the Boston Guardian and the Lincolnshire Independent of August 10, 1895, under the following headlines:

BOSTON, EAST AND WEST—THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR VISITS THE BOROUGH—SPEECH DAY AT THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL—COMPLIMENTARY DINNER—PRESENTATIONS OF AN ILLUSTRATED ADDRESS.

This account of the performance is authentic, because Mr. Bayard attaches it to his letter to the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney. His only explanation of the silly affair is that he spoke "without premeditation" and that everything was "impromptu" and that "a humorous postprandial tone" prevailed, and that the reporters failed to catch his words, sometimes in Latin, and confused them.

This authenticated account goes on to say that his excellency [Mr. Bayard] was accompanied by his worship the mayor, who wore his "robes and chain of office," and that several of the best citizens were present. It also informs us that Mr. Bayard's lineage can be traced back to the same family as that of the "ideal chivalry," the Seigneur Pierre du Terrail de Bayard, the chevalier sans peur et sans reproche.

At this point the RECORD discloses the fact that the House laughed, and small wonder. My friend from Texas in his speech intimated something about a press agent working overtime. I think he will agree with me that the earmarks of press agency are plentifully apparent here. But let me continue my quotation from Mr. Cousins's remarks:

Having thus laid a substantial foundation for the social standing of the American ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary among the grammar scholars of Lincolnshire, the account further says that—

"Mr. Bayard's acknowledgment was marked by a depth of feeling, a sincerity of tone."

Now, whether it was "humorous and postprandial" or with "depth of feeling" and "sincerity of tone," the confusion, Mr. Speaker, is no doubt satisfactorily explained by the newspaper account of the ambassador attached to his letter to the Secretary of State, and which says that "some of those who took part in the evening proceedings betrayed a lack of appreciation of the importance of the guest, otherwise they would not have interrupted his remarks by the cracking of filberts."

My friend from Texas is wroth because our resident ambassador to England lives in Dorchester House; but I am positive that if the Congress of the United States had heeded the pressing appeals made by so many of our Executives, almost from the foundation of the Republic to the present day, and had purchased or constructed an embassy building in London, no matter how humble, Mr. Reid cheerfully would have made that building his official residence. Every man who has ever met our ambassador to England knows that to be true; and if he does live in an imposing and stately mansion in the British capital, it is entirely due to the niggardliness of our own Government in having failed to furnish him with a suitable residence.

It is evident that my friend from Texas is not very familiar with real property values in London or Berlin or Paris. They are old and populous capitals. They are built up solidly and compactly, and vacant lots such as one sees in our large American municipalities are exceedingly uncommon. Property values in these European capitals are just as high, and possibly a trifle higher, than they are in New York or Chicago. It cost our Government $130,000 to purchase the American embassy building in Constantinople. It is not likely that we will be able to purchase a site and building and install the necessary furniture in an eligible or desirable locality in either London, Berlin, or Paris for the sum of $150,000.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KAHN. I have only four or five minutes remaining, and I would like to get right down to several interesting matters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RUSSELL). The gentleman from California has one minute more.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended in order that he may complete his remarks.

Mr. KAHN. And may I suggest that the gentleman from Texas be given a similar amount of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended to complete his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, and that the same time be accorded to myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that the gentleman from Texas have a similar time.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, not desiring to object, I wish the gentleman would state how much time he will want.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, 10 or 15 minutes more.

Mr. PAGE. Then I suggest that it be made 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Make it 25 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. It is not necessary for me to have that much time.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I want to ask him a question or two when he gets through.

Mr. PAGE. Make it 20 minutes. My idea is to make the time specific and not indefinite.

Mr. CANNON. Still, we have time to throw at the birds.

Mr. KAHN. Make it 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from California that if our present ambassador in Great Britain be living in a style of some magnificence, he had an illustrious example, and I wish to read just a word from page 139 of "A Century of American Diplomacy," by John W. Foster, in which the author says:

> During his residence in Paris Mr. Jefferson set an example, often followed since, of taking "a handsome house * * * of considerable magnificence," and he lived in such style that after spending his salary, "with all the aid he could get from his private fortune, he was hard pressed to meet his expenses." He wrote to his friends in Congress, suggesting that an effort be made to increase his salary, but no relief came from that quarter, and it is understood that his later bankruptcy dates its origin to his life in Paris.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I am thankful to the gentleman for having called that fact to the attention of the House. At an earlier period of my speech I called the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Jefferson had appealed unsuccessfully to Congress for an increase in the salary, which he declared to be inadequate, by reason of his heavy expenses.

Mr. Speaker, while the building of the American legation should be a plain but substantial one, it should also be of such a character and in such a location that the American citizen traveling abroad will take an honest pride in it, even as he takes an honest pride in the public buildings here in Washington. He will not be satisfied with anything less, and would probably prefer to let matters drift along as at present rather than take anything less.

My friend in his speech also referred to the so-called international marriages. I think we are all in accord upon this subject. I wish a way could be devised for taxing the dowries of American brides in these matrimonial ventures, so that the penurious but titled fortune-hunter might secure but a small moiety of the price the bride pays him for a name which he himself dishonors by thus putting it up at auction to the highest bidder. [Applause.] Every true American citizen must be thoroughly disgusted with the performances of this character that have filled so much space in recent years in our American newspapers. If only the young American heiress and her parents could realize, with the late poet laureate of England, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, that—

> True hearts are more than coronets,
> And simple faith than Norman blood—

there would probably be fewer of these usually unhappy alliances in the future; but no less disgusting and revolting than the marriage itself is the snobbish curiosity of American men and women who flock to the vicinage of the church where the marriage is to be solemnized in order to blankly stare upon the bridal pair. The New York World of November 7, 1895, bore the following headlines on the occasion of the marriage of Consuelo Vanderbilt and the Duke of Marlborough:

> NOW SHE IS A DUCHESS. * * * FIVE THOUSAND WOMEN AND TWO THOUSAND MEN STRUGGLED IN THE STREET IN FRONT OF ST. THOMAS'S—INSIDE, FAIR GUESTS CLIMBED ON SEATS—THE DUKE AND HIS BRIDE GUARDED BY POLICEMEN AT CHURCH, AT HOME, AND AT DEPOT.

Mr. Speaker, according to recent press accounts the duchess is to-day a sadder but wiser woman. But the very acme of snobbishness, in my judgment, was reached when Miss May Goelet became the Duchess of Roxburghe. Again I quote from the New York World, and in this instance from the issue of November 11, 1903:

> WELL-DRESSED WOMEN MOB GOELET BRIDE—SEIZE HER HORSES BY THE REINS, CLIMB INTO HER CARRIAGE, AND SNATCH AT THE FLOWERS IN HER HAIR—MOUNTED POLICE DRIVE THEM BACK—WEDDING CEREMONY IN BOWER OF WHITE BLOOM—FOUR HUNDRED PRESENT IN THE CHURCH—TWO HUNDRED AT THE RECEPTION—DUKE AND DUCHESS DRIVE AWAY IN A SHOWER OF RICE AND WHITE SLIPPERS.
> Miss May Goelet was married yesterday to the Duke of Roxburghe at St. Thomas's Church, Fifth Avenue.
>
> * * * * * * *
> BRIDE MOBBED BY WOMEN.
> Fully 5,000 women—vulgar curiosity seekers, though most of them were very well dressed—jammed the streets adjoining the church and the Goelet mansion, which are four blocks apart.
>
> And these women were not content merely to watch the bridal party. They literally mobbed the bride and the church. They climbed up on the steps of the bride's carriage and poked their heads through the window, some of them even attempting to pick flowers from the bride's dress and veil; they climbed up on the church by using the heavy Virginia creepers as a ladder; they discovered a coal hole in the church area, that no one had thought to guard; and before the police had recovered from their astonishment a score of them had descended the narrow, begrimed stairway into the cellar and were groping among the dark coal bins, smearing their dainty gloves and dresses with coal dust.
> Before the service began women made their way to the end of a passage in the cellar and tried to burst open a door leading to the church above. The noise they made attracted some of the church attendants, who sent for the police, several of whom had already followed the women, and were arguing with them, urging them to leave. But arguments were vain. The women still kept up their attempts to burst the door leading to the church proper, and the policemen had actually to lay hands on them before they would leave. They had to come up through the same coal hole they had descended, and they presented a bedraggled and besmirched appearance when they issued, ignominiously, in the yard on the Fifty-third Street side. Some of them had white feathers in their hats when they descended, but when they reappeared, crestfallen, some in tears, the feathers were black.
> CLIMBED IN OVER LUMBER.
> Repairs are being made in the choir rooms at the rear of the church, which are entered by a door opening on the church area. A pile of lumber 5 feet high was on the piazza in front of this door. Some choir boys opened the door, and immediately a dozen women clambered over the lumber pile and forced their way into the choir rooms, brushing aside the choristers and attendants.
> More women scrambled in after them, until about 40 were inside, the attendants expostulating but powerless.
>
> Women kept jumping over the hedges of boxwood lining the paths of the area and then upon the porch and over the lumber.
> There was a compact mass of women around the main entrance of the church several hours before the service was to begin. Other battalions stormed the side doors. No one was admitted at these, yet for an hour before the ceremony and while it lasted women stood in crowds gazing wistfully at the relentless oaken portals. These women were expensively dressed, in correct costume for a wedding, and when they heard the music inside and realized that the ceremony was in progress tears of vexation and disappointment came to the eyes of some, and they presented such a ludicrously pathetic picture that even the policemen commented on their forlorn appearance.

I will cheerfully join with the gentleman from Texas in any effort he or the Members of the majority of this House may make to curb this tendency of bartering our fair American heiresses for the questionable consideration of a foreign title.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it was the crafty French King, Louis XI, who instructed his ambassadors to lie still more when they found that the officers of the States to which they were accredited indulged in the art of lying to them. Stubbs in his "Medieval History" defines an ambassador as "a person sent to lie abroad for the good of his country," and Lord Palmerston, the distinguished British diplomat, inferentially approves this definition, but adds, "thou shalt not be found out."

Even in 1733 Dr. Franklin was roundly denounced before the privy council of England by Wedderburn, the attorney general of that country, when the distinguished American sage, philosopher and diplomat, was sojourning in London as the agent of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, for having profited by the theft of confidential papers that had been written by Gov. Hutchinson to Mr. Whateley, the private secretary of Lord Grenville, of the English cabinet. And the mission of Arthur Lee to the court of Frederick the Great of Prussia failed of its purpose because Elliott, the English representative at that Prussian post, surreptitiously obtained possession of Lee's private papers, notes, and dispatches, and thus was able to thwart his plans.

Mr. Speaker, American diplomacy to-day is the diplomacy of candor. It is the diplomacy of directness. It insists on a square deal in the great game of international affairs. It has brought honor and glory to the American name. The policy of the "open door," the policy of free opportunity for the citizens of all countries in the Orient, has given immortality to the name of the lamented John Hay; and the glory of his achievements has added a luminous page to the annals of American diplomacy.

The splendid efforts of ELIHU ROOT to bind more firmly the ties of friendship that exist between the Republics of Central and South America and ourselves will prove an inspiration to our Secretaries of State of the future in the same laudable direction. The brilliant and successful efforts of Philander C. Knox to extend American trade and to interest American capital in the uplift of the people of sister Republics, and even far-distant lands, and his pioneer work in making American diplomacy not a specialty here or there, but an intense and world-wide vigilant promotion of the interests of the American people, will be acclaimed with due appreciation by many generations yet to come.

In a speech delivered on this floor in January, 1855, John Perkins, jr., of Louisiana, uttered this sentiment:

A foreign minister is not now so much the court congratulator as the business agent of his Government; and it is more his exact knowledge of the progress and development of the trade and material interests of his country, and the history of its laws and legislation, as affecting other countries, and indicating the spirit and tendency of public opinion at home, that gives him influence, than the costliness of his living, or the degree of luster he can contribute to the brilliancy of court displays.

As the years have rolled on since those words were uttered our Secretaries of State have realized more and more the necessity for upbuilding American trade and commerce.

In the days of democratic simplicity, so much extolled by my friend from Texas, and until a comparatively recent period, the Diplomatic Service of our country did not offer a career to those who entered it. Appointments in the service, as I have heretofore stated, were frequently made to pay political debts and without a due regard to the fitness of the appointee for the position which he was called upon to occupy. All this has been changed in recent years, and I believe that if my friend from Texas were in very truth to attempt to revive the old, decrepit system of the days of primitive democratic simplicity, he would find that the American people would rise in their might and protest with all the vigor at their command against his effort.

Sir, until 1896 ours was a debtor nation. Ever since then the balance of the world's trade has been in our favor, and we have become and are now a creditor nation. The upbuilding of our trade and the investment of American capital, not only at home, but in all sections of the world, has too frequently been derisively referred to as "dollar diplomacy," just as our diplomacy of the days of democratic simplicity was formerly referred to as "shirt-sleeve" diplomacy. In his speech of last Wednesday the gentleman from Texas entirely subverted the true meaning of the phrase "dollar diplomacy." Let me tell him what dollar diplomacy is and what it has done for our country during the last few years

As has well been said by Mr. Huntington Wilson, Assistant Secretary of State, "It is not the use of the Government by capital, but the use of capital by the Government in effective furtherance of some broad policy beneficial to the United States and the American people and to the world." It contemplates helping the Government of Liberia by aiding that Government to extricate itself from the meshes of financial disaster. It contemplates helping the Government of Nicaragua to pay its indebtedness and thus to contribute toward the peace and prosperity of the inhabitants of a sister Republic. It contemplates extricating the Republic of Honduras from its burdens of debt, and by removing the temptation of insurrectionists to seize the customhouses for their own personal gain, to establish the stability of the Government of Central American Republics, just as similar efforts on the part of this Government have brought stability and prosperity to the hitherto contentious factions of Santo Domingo.

Dollar diplomacy contemplates the participation of American capital in the Hukuang loan and the currency-reform loan in China, and by such participation to help materially in the stimulation of American trade in the Chinese Empire.

It means the extension of American commerce. Within the past year or two the activities of our American legations in that direction have added millions of dollars to our export trade. This is notably the case in our commerce with the Central and South American Republics.

It means the maintenance of national honor at home and abroad. I remember when a boy it frequently—yes, all too frequently—happened that our country had to seek the aid of European governments to protect the life and property of American citizens whose interests were jeopardized in various parts of the globe. Under the influence of dollar diplomacy the international obligations have shifted. Only recently England has asked us to protect the life and property of her citizens in the Republic of Haiti. Only recently Germany has invoked the good offices of this Government in the matter of settling the claims of German citizens against the Government of Guatemala. Only recently Italy has invoked the same good offices in the matter of settling the claims of her citizens against Salvador.

And if dollar diplomacy has performed no other service, it is entitled to the everlasting gratitude of mankind for having extended its good offices to avert war between Ecuador and Peru and between the Dominican Republic and Haiti. Dollar diplomacy exerted its good offices to put an end to civil war in Honduras. It was instrumental in accomplishing the settlement of the bitter boundary dispute between Peru and Bolivia in a friendly and amicable spirit. And so I could keep on reciting the many really great achievements of our Department of State during the past two or three years. But the country and the world know and recognize the value of these achievements. Despite the despairing cry of my friend from Texas for a return to the days of diplomatic democratic simplicity—a simplicity that had its existence only in tradition and not in fact—the diplomacy of the present—dollar diplomacy, if you will—honest, sincere, candid, earnest, has attained a standard never surpassed in our country's history, and has added glory, honor, and prestige to the American Commonwealth in every section of the globe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it seemed proper for me to reserve 20 minutes for replying to the address of my amiable friend from California [Mr. KAHN], but it does not now appear that it will be needed in order to answer him. However, I shall indulge a few remarks discussing what he has said.

The gentleman spoke of an incident in our early history when one of our diplomats expended $21,000 and was called to account for it. In that case we, at least, had the advantage of knowing the exact amount and the items for which the expenditures were made, but when it comes to the modern "open," "candid diplomacy" of the present Secretary of State, while we know that a certain amount of money was used and only a portion of it expended on a "portrait," we can not ascertain under this "candid diplomacy" how the other part was expended.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will allow me to correct him?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the incident to which the gentleman alludes did not occur under the present Secretary of State.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It did not occur under the present Secretary of State, but when the expenditures of the people's money are questioned, information respecting them should not be withheld under the cover of "diplomatic secrets." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I merely intended to have the gentleman correct in his statement as to the present Secretary of State.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman states that while the incident which I mentioned occurred, the gentleman who drew down $21,000 was called to account. I have been unable to find anything in contemporaneous history, that is, in the history of that period, that shows that he was called to account. I made the statement to the House that the account of the incident was given in the biography of John Randolph by a well-known historic writer in this country.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not care at this time to discuss further the tender point just raised. We will hear more about it later. I meet the gentleman and accept his challenge in so far as he has endeavored to make argument this morning indorsing the recent riotous scenes occurring at the capital of Great Britain, and say that when the verdict of the people is rendered it will not be in approval of the lavish expenditure of money as exhibited on that occasion. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman speaks of our early diplomats and takes some time in reading a program of procedure when an ambassador came to our country. We all understand that in those days diplomacy was a cold, formal, and inexpensive matter. Why, the men who wrote the Declaration of American Independence wore knee breeches. They were formal in those days, and it is not of the polite formalities of which complaint is here made, but the vulgar extravagance into which this Nation has recently rushed in diplomatic matters. Mr. Speaker, my remarks were based upon a simple resolution introduced some days ago calling on the Secretary of State for certain information. And, first, let me preface what I say by calling your attention to the resolution and the act to which reference is made. The resolution was in this language:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House what action he has taken toward carrying out the provisions of the act approved February 17, 1911, providing for the acquisition in foreign countries of sites and buildings for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, when that resolution was introduced I had an idea and now have the notion that the Secretary of State has taken no steps to carry out the mandate of the Congress in regard to the same, because there are those in this country who do not wish to see the simplicity in our foreign affairs obtain that would be necessary if this act were executed by the Secretary of State. The gentleman speaks of the value of houses and lands in foreign capitals. Let us discuss that in a candid and serious fashion. In this act we provided for the expenditure of $500,000 every year for the purpose of securing embassies and houses abroad for our ambassadors and diplomatic officers. We provided that $150,000 shall be the limit of any one of them, thereby authorizing the expenditure of $450,000 in each year. Mr. Speaker, is that a liberal allowance? The gentleman complains that we can not purchase the buildings and furnish them for that sum. How much, I ask him, does he wish this Government to appropriate? Let us compare it with the buildings the European Governments occupy in this Capital.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. I simply stated, if the gentleman will recall, that it would probably be impossible to secure an appropriate site and a building, together with the furniture, in the three great European capitals—London, Berlin, and Paris. I did not refer to any of the other cities of the world because I think that $150,000 would probably be enough in any one of them, with the possible exception of Vienna; but in the three cities which I named I think the gentleman will find the property values will be so high that it will be impossible to purchase a building in a suitable location in those three cities.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I accept the gentleman's argument on that basis.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have authorized the expenditure of $150,000 for each building and the furniture. The gentleman complains that that is not enough for those three places. Let us compare them with the embassies of the British Government, the German Empire, and the French Republic in the city of Washington. You are all familiar with them. Take the Kingdom of Great Britain and examine their building at Washington. Is it worth $150,000?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman desire to compare this noncommercial city of Washington, with its 300,000 inhabitants, and the property values here, with the property values in the city of London, with 7,000,000 inhabitants; the city of Paris, with probably between two and three million inhabitants; and the city of Berlin, with over 3,000,000 inhabitants, and each one of those cities not only great capitals, but great commercial cities?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With the "pauper labor of Europe," about which the gentleman's party so often complains, houses in Europe ought to be sold cheaper than in our country. Mr. Speaker, I am not comparing those houses for the purpose of contending that we should be limited to $150,000, but to illustrate the point that the main thing this Government should do is to provide a home for our ambassadors in order to maintain the dignity of this great Government as it should be abroad. [Applause.] With $150,000 we will be able to find a suitable home, a dignified residence for our American ambassador in London, as in the days of Thomas Francis Bayard, when he paid only £1,000 a year for his house and furniture. Let us see how these Governments have treated us. They have sent their ambassadors here. They are maintaining themselves in a dignified and unostentatious manner. We have no complaint to make of them, and, in view of such situation, if this Government of ours will expend $150,000 a year, and do it speedily as the act provides the Secretary of State shall do, we will find a decent, commodious, and suitable home for our ambassadors in each of the three capitals to which the gentleman alludes, and it will not be necessary for Mr. Reid, the American ambassador, to spend $400,000 a year for a country estate and town house in order to maintain a viceregal establishment, as he does in London. It is not typical of this Government. The time has come for the American people to enter a protest to such matters as these.

The gentleman says our ambassadors did some queer things in the early days. He says that Jay kissed the hand of the queen and was criticized for it. We should be thankful he had the good taste to "kiss the hand of a woman" rather than "nudge" a King. Mr. Speaker, let me allude to some of our recent diplomatic triumphs in London. Let the American people take into consideration these things and pass judgment upon the issues between the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and myself. Permit me to call your attention to some things transpiring at the coronation show. The cable flashes this message of discord:

REID, JEALOUS, SNUBS HAMMOND AT DINNER.

LONDON, July 1.

According to gossip here all has not been blithe and merry between John Hays Hammond and Whitelaw Reid, respectively special ambassador to the coronation of the King and the regular American ambassador at the Court of St. James.

Much talk has resulted from the fact that when the Reids gave their big dinner dance in honor of the Connaught family the Hammonds were not seated at the hosts' table, where the guests of honor were.

The Duke of Connaught evened matters up a little by paying marked respects to Mrs. Hammond and taking her into supper. Those who do not like Ambassador Reid here say he could not bear to see another American more in the limelight at the coronation ceremonies and entertainments than himself.

Mr. Speaker, it ought to be investigated, and if John Hays Hammond is supplanting Ambassador Reid, seeking kingly favors, some sort of punishment ought to be administered. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from California says that when the King and Queen were in a great royal procession and recognized John Hays Hammond and his wife they were not recognized merely as individuals, but that the King and Queen were recognizing this Government. We should be thankful that at last a king and queen of a great monarchy are forced to recognize our American Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Some other "serious matters" have occurred since then, and it is hoped that Mr. Hammond will take his departure from the London capital before something desperate occurs. Let me call to your attention this cablegram:

HAMMOND NUDGES THE KING, SOCIETY IS HORRIFIED, BUT THE MONARCH HIMSELF SMILES, AT LONDON DINNER.

NEW YORK, July 10.

A London cable to the New York American says:

"John Hays Hammond and family go to Scotland to-morrow, leaving aristocratic Anglo-American society horrified by a story that has just leaked out.

"At Sir Edward Grey's dinner to the King at the foreign office Mr. Hammond, in speaking, touched the royal elbow, saying, 'I should think, sir, you would be gratified that everything passed off without a hitch'—

He meant by that expression that the crown did not get "hitched" to something else before getting to the King's head. Fortunate King! Or, perhaps, he felicitated the King upon the fact that Hammond and Reid had not "hitched," which really looked imminent at one important stage of the proceedings. Perhaps he meant that the King was fortunate that the crown did not get "hitched" to Hammond's head. For really it looked doubtful for several days in American papers whether the coronation ceremonies were convened for the purpose of crowning Hammond instead of George. We are sure the King won, because John congratulated George the victor—

"The King smilingly replied—'

It was good of the King to smile. Then it showed he was certain he had landed ahead of Hammond.

"'Mr. Hammond, I am glad to hear you say it.'

"The Duchess of Roxburghe, Countess Granard, and Mrs. John Ward, who saw Mr. Hammond's familiarity with the monarch, criticized the action seriously. But royalty seems happiest to be treated like humanity."

Mr. Speaker, we have arrived at a happy point where one of our American diplomats can go abroad as a special envoy, reveling in wealth, and touch the elbow of the King. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have advanced in diplomacy since old John Jay kissed the hand of the Queen, when our ambassador is so familiar with the King that he can "nudge" him. [Laughter.] As an American I feel proud of it. Hereafter, as a tribute to his diplomatic prowess, let him be known in history as "Jack the Nudger." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman believe that when an ambassador to-day can nudge a king we have advanced in democratic simplicity and that the period of to-day is the true period of democratic simplicity?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not believe that John Hays Hammond could ever have nudged the King if he had not worn his knee breeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would suggest, in reply to the gentleman from California, who thinks we have advanced because in olden days they kissed the king's hand and now we nudge the king's elbow, that it seems to me that is going backward. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Not being a lady's man, like my friend from Nebraska, I did not make the remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Can the gentleman tell me what hour it was?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The information I have is that it was just about 3.45 in the morning, just the time when they carried home the ambassador, to whom the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] referred a few moments ago.

Mr. HARDY. I think the time ought to be known, or if it was not noted I would have expected that the clock had stopped. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think it would help to illuminate this subject a little if he would describe this peculiar nudge that was indulged in on this particular occasion—just how it was done? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It undoubtedly would contribute to the understanding of the subject and edify the House very much. I feel sure it was a genuine California nudge. It might have been a hunch.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to the gentleman that if it was a California nudge——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I decline to yield to anyone at this point except the King of England or John Hays Hammond. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, to show the impression made on the American people—and it is a serious question—permit me to read extracts from an American newspaper, the Washington Herald, of this morning:

WHEN HAMMOND NUDGED THE KING.

Ye gods and little fishes, how the dukes and duchesses around the royal presence palpitated when Hammond nudged the King!

Upon the tip of the ambassador's tongue trembled a remark. He wanted to tell his royal highness that the coronation had passed off as easily as a greased pig runs around the circus arena, or words to that effect. And to make sure that the monarch would get the full effect of the complimentary remark, he gave the benign ruler a gentle touch upon the sleeve.

It was a breech of etiquette, perhaps, and the lords and ladies stood aghast. Did the King faint or scowl or demand that the bold and bad American should preface his action with a "by your leave"? Not at all. He responded in an affable and happy manner, as if he, too, were made of common flesh and rather enjoyed being treated in human fashion. Whereupon the titled audience wondered all the more.

But we Americans will like the British King all the better for the good sense which he displayed when he felt a gentle pressure upon his royal person. Easily, John Hays Hammond is the hero of the hour.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if we send this envoy to another coronation carnival, in imitation of the polite French style, he will "nudge" the Queen. [Laughter.] So you see, Mr. Speaker, the importance of the issue between the gentleman from California and myself. His remarks were learned, and contributed to our edification; but, in all seriousness, he failed to touch the real subject before the American people.

A little more than half a century ago we had scarcely a millionaire in this country, and to-day more than half the wealth of the Republic is concentrated in the hands of a few. We have an ambassador at London paying more than $400,000 per annum for a town house and country estate, according to the reports cabled from that capital. We had a special ambassador there on a recent historic occasion with his retinues dressed in diamonds and peacock feathers. Tell me that the American people will indorse that kind of extravagance! Mr Speaker, what are we coming to when a gentleman will stand before the American people and say that we must send multimillionaires abroad as ambassadors, and that real scholars and diplomatists must stand back and decline the posts because they are not endowed with sufficient riches to maintain them? [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was that very thing in my mind when this resolution was introduced. We will go before the American people, not in a partisan sense, in 1912 and see whether they authorize you to put these great diplomatic posts up to be bought in by the highest bidder amongst multimillionaires, or whether the Eliots and the David Jayne Hills and the Thomas Francis Bayards and men of that type shall reflect the true dignity of this mighty Republic. Mr. Speaker, I referred to Thomas Francis Bayard as a typical American ambassador and reiterate my statement on this occasion. The gentleman alludes to the fact that Bayard made some speech while abroad that was not received favorably there and in some quarters of our country.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Just one minute. I am proud of the fact that old Thomas Francis Bayard, that typical American, "unmuzzled" himself and spoke as becomes an American citizen. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is not familiar with the matter to which I alluded. The speech of Mr. Bayard was received with great applause in England, but it was not well received in this country. He made the statement that we were a "violent people," and that it required a great man "to govern us," Grover Cleveland being the great man at that time. That caused the resolutions to be brought into this House censuring Mr. Bayard.

Mr. BARTLETT. And which did not pass.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if he did make that statement, I am glad of it. We have no business making it a secret that we are a violent people. Let us agree that we are violent, and sooner or later we will correct the evil. We do need a great man as an Executive, and we had one when Grover Cleveland filled the Presidency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, he is not the last great man we will have. Let me say to the gentleman if his party will indorse what he says about the lavish expenditure of wealth upon that recent riotous occasion, and similar ones, we will have another great man for President in 1912, and he will not come from that side of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Allusion was made to the fact that Charles W. Eliot, the president of Harvard University for years, had declined the position of ambassador to Great Britain. He could not accept that great honor because he was financially poor, although he had every endowment of intellect and heart and conscience, and was admirably qualified to be our representative at that ancient court. It is a shame to the American people that such a man could not accept the position, but had to give way to that vulgar wealth now rapidly dragging its blighting trail over every cottage in this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

One of our accomplished diplomatists had to give way in another court. Why has Dr. David Jayne Hill relinquished his post at the court of the German Empire? It has been stated more than once in the public press that the German Emperor indicated to him, either directly or indirectly, that a poverty-stricken ambassador there was not desirable. That one was desired like the vice regal Charlemagne Tower, who, if possible, outvied John Hays Hammond and Whitelaw Reid in the almost obscene expenditure of wealth. But his career is cut short—a finished, scholarly, capable diplomat—and the country is yet uninformed as to why he relinquished his post. When the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] speaks of the "candid diplomacy of the present Secretary of State," will he answer me and tell the American people why Dr. David J. Hill left the German court and has practically been compelled to give up his post? Will the gentleman take the American people into his confidence? Will the "candid Secretary of State" tell the American people why he has resigned? Ah, Mr. Speaker, if he can not and will not tell, I think we know the answer. Perhaps the history coming after us will verify what is said here this day, unless the President changes his mind. It has been stated more than once in the public press and in private that this great diplomat was forced to give up his high station at the behest of the German Emperor in order that some gentleman of South African fame, with great riches, might be sent to Germany, and there renew the extravagance witnessed several years ago. History will justify me in this prediction, unless the President changes his mind. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, it would be preferable that this Government should not send any ambassador to Germany rather than bow to the decree of that Empire when the test of sordid riches is fixed as the sine qua non of acceptability. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Will the gentleman meet me on that issue in this House or elsewhere?

Mr. KAHN. What was the question the gentleman desired to ask?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have two questions. First, I wanted to know why Dr. David J. Hill resigned his post at Berlin, and if the gentleman from California indorses the proposition that John Hays Hammond shall be the ambassador to Germany, as the President intends at this date he shall be?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that I have seen nothing in the papers that would convince me that Mr. Hill has resigned. I have seen no notice of his resignation, to begin with. As far as any appointment is concerned, I am not in the confidence of the President to that extent. I should feel very happy if the President were to honor me by asking me my opinion; and if he were to ask me whether John Hays

Hammond, as a gentleman and a scholar, could adequately represent this Government at any court in the world, I should unhesitatingly give my approval of such an appointment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had been reading the published current events instead of the diplomatic history of ancient times, he might have ascertained that Dr. David J. Hill has relinquished his post at Berlin.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. I understood the gentleman to say that Dr. Hill has resigned. I have seen nothing in any responsible paper that confirms that statement.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, they are just waiting for John Hays Hammond to get through in England, go over to Scotland, come back to this country, and get his credentials.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With great pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not a fact that the statement was made in some newspaper and denied the next day in regard to Mr. Hill being persona non grata in Berlin? Was it not denied the next day, and has not it been denied two or three times since? He does not know anything more about it than we do.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from New York is always right to this extent, just about to the degree he is behind on his information in regard to tariff revision. It is true the statement was given out that he had resigned, and that it was denied the next day. But here is where the gentleman fails in his perception. It was repeated the next day and has not been since denied.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes; it was denied until they got out of type.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, they have repeated it again; so it has not been denied since the last time.

Mr. PAYNE. If I will deny it? I absolutely have no information. I am just like the gentleman, inasmuch as I do not know anything about it. When I see a thing in the newspaper, and then see it denied and then see it asserted again and then denied I do not know which tells the truth.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will admit that you "have no information," but will not agree that you are "just like the gentleman from Texas."

Mr. PAYNE. Then I will amend that. In matters like this I am just like the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] referred to Thomas Jefferson, and said that while abroad he was so extravagant he had to write home and ask that his salary be increased. They did not increase it, and yet it was small. They did not comply with his request. Everybody knows that Thomas Jefferson, while the greatest Democrat this world ever produced, had no idea how to save and spend money in his personal matters. They refused to allow him to set the pace over in Europe and to increase his salary.

Mr. Speaker, I think the points have been made plain that are essential for this country to understand. And it is asserted to-day, as on the 5th day of July, that the almost obscene display of wealth and personal adornment at the London capital was nauseating to this country and every enlightened people of the earth. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It gratifies me that the gentleman agrees in regard to "international marriages." Everybody will concur that the time has come when the American boy is a loftier character than thin-blooded, puny princes of any European country. So, Mr. Speaker, if we can awaken the American people on this question and hark back to the early days of the Republic, when our expenditures were few and frugal, when there were no fortunes mountain high to be displayed on every public occasion, if we can recall the people to that era of our diplomacy when Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe presided over our destinies, we may avert the day when corruption of riches will certainly corrode and undermine the very foundations of the Republic, thus reversing our history of more than a hundred years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Laura E. R. Hatfield, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12361) providing for the establishment and operation of a Government owned and controlled line of steamers along the Pacific coast and through the Panama Canal, and making provisions therefor, and the same was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas (at 3 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Saturday, July 15, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, calling attention to department letter of June 9, 1911, relative to disposition of useless executive documents pertaining to the Bureau of Insular Affairs and on request of Librarian of Congress withdrawing recommendation that they be destroyed (H. Doc. No. 92); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Missouri River, Sioux City, Iowa, to Fort Benton, Mont. (H. Doc. No. 91); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10255) granting an increase of pension to James Kenyon; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 12198) granting an increase of pension to Frederick W. Duden; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 9673) granting a pension to Julia M. Ashby; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 3720) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Burnett; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 12383) granting a pension to William Barth; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 12406) to establish a fish hatchery and fish-cultural station in the State of South Carolina; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12407) to provide for the erection of a monument to Brig. Gen. Andrew Pickens; to the Committee on the Library.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12408) to remove obstructions to lawful commerce between the States and with foreign nations; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12409) dividing the State of South Carolina into two judicial districts, providing for the appointment of a district judge, etc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 12410) for the erection of a public building at the city of Susanville, State of California, and appropriating moneys therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12411) to purchase and provide grounds and erect buildings and furnish the same for the Greenville Indian School, at Greenville, Cal.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. RODDENBERY: A bill (H. R. 12412) to increase the pay of rural carriers and to extend and perfect the rural mail service; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12413) to extend and improve rural free mail delivery so as to deliver mail daily at the door or upon the premises of each patron on rural mail routes throughout the United States; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WICKLIFFE: A bill (H. R. 12414) to provide for the proper utilization of the equipment used or obtained for use in the construction of the Panama Canal when said equipment or any part thereof is no longer necessary in the construction or to the maintenance of said canal, by utilizing said equipment in the improvement of the rivers and harbors in the United States for navigation, for the construction of works in reclamation, drainage, and irrigation projects in the United States, when authorized by Congress, and for the construction and improvement of public highways in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 12415) to prevent and punish the desecration of the flag of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TALCOTT of New York: A bill (H. R. 12416) to promote the safety of passengers and other persons upon railroads by compelling carriers engaged in interstate commerce and in carrying United States mail to properly locate in trains cars constructed of wood; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CALDER: A bill (H. R. 12417) to provide for the establishment and equipment of life-saving stations upon the waters of the United States not at present protected by the United States Life-Saving Service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 12418) to prevent dumping of refuse material into the Missouri River opposite or in front of Platte County, Mo., or opposite or in front of Leavenworth County, in the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 12419) providing for the removal of certain actions pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia from one justice of said court to another justice of the same court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GOOD: A bill (H. R. 12420) granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico, and amending the act of April 19, 1908, relative to widows of soldiers, etc., of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORRISON: A bill (H. R. 12421) to amend an act making an appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, approved April 19, 1910; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 12422) providing for the per capita distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the unallotted lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. LAMB: A bill (H. R. 12423) for the purchase and preservation of Jamestown Island, Va., as a national park, and making an appropriation therefor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KENT: A bill (H. R. 12424) to authorize a survey of San Rafael Creek, Marin County, Cal.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. WARBURTON: A bill (H. R. 12425) to establish a mint of the United States at Tacoma, in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) providing that the records of the various departments of the Government, so far as they cover or relate to any claim against the United States, shall be open to inspection of Members of the House and Senate; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts: Memorial from the Legislature of Massachusetts urging United States Government to exert all possible means to amend present treaty with Russia, or form new treaty, by which American citizens, regardless of race, color, or creed, traveling in that country shall not be treated with discrimination; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 13, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for Thy word that Thou wilt not leave us nor forsake us until Thou hast done that which Thou hast promised unto us. As we come unto Thee with troubled hearts and saddened spirits, fulfill in Thy servants, we pray Thee, Thine own word. Restore to Thine afflicted servants, we beseech Thee, the joy of Thy salvation, and in their sore and sudden loss strengthen them with Thy heavenly grace. And unto Thee, who givest and who takest away, will we ascribe praise now and for evermore. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House has passed a bill (H. R. 12312) to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby authorized to employ an assistant clerk, at a salary of $1,800 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12312. An act to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ABOLITION OF SENATE OFFICES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. LODGE. By agreement, I think the motion to reconsider Senate resolution No. 74 comes over from yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the understanding.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not see the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion was entered to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, with the understanding that it should be disposed of this morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of pleading the cause of an old, faithful, and honest negro man. I do not know that I have anything to urge in his behalf except a sentiment. Amongst all of the magnificent attributes of the human race, I think Tom Carlyle was right in saying that "loyalty" was the greatest of them all—loyalty to a country, to a State, to a cause, to a leader, to a man—loyalty to something. It is not peculiarly one of our American virtues. This old darky possessed it in a very high degree. He is very old now, I believe pretty nearly 80 years of age.

They say that he has done no work for about two years, or very little. I have no doubt that is true. But, Mr. President, you do not always compensate by present service for what you are receiving. If character and past services can not heap up a superfluity of services to be credited to present employment in old age some time, the world would be rather a bad place to live in. Here is, for example, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and in my time I have known many more. Who is there who would have called upon Morgan or Pettus, of Alabama, or the Senator from Maine, or anybody else, to resign because they could not render each day a present service for a present emolument? They had already overrendered it in character of service.

Mr. President, this old darky was loyal as a slave to Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi. That loyalty might have been accounted for by the fact that maybe it was the part of the policy of the slave's position. But when freedom came he was loyal still, loyal to the man who had been his master, who had never said a cross word to him or laid upon him a blow. He followed him voluntarily as his bodyguard. He went with him to Fortress Monroe. He went into the cell there with him, and when old, emaciated, broken down by four years of nervous tension and public service, the old master was seized and shackled, this old darky was there with sympathy, help, and tears. He stayed with him all the time.

Oh, they say he can not perform any service now. They say he is not performing any right now. I do not doubt this statement. And maybe he never will be able to perform any. But why begin with him? If you are going to execute that sort of policy in the departments and everywhere, all right; but I do not know a Senator within the sound of my voice who does not know that not only in the departments but perhaps upon the rolls of this very Senate there are others. And that is not all, Mr. President. It may be true, though I do not know—I ask if it be not true that there are able-bodied men upon the rolls of the Senate who perform no sort of service, some of them perhaps sons or nephews or sons-in-law of public men?

I appeal to you, Senators, to let this old darky stay on the roll. It may be that some time he will be able to come back to perform service. The Nation took away from him his master, whose business it was to provide for him in his old age. In a certain sort of sense, then, the Nation has substituted itself for the master and for the master's responsibility.

Mr. President, there is not a Confederate reunion that is within a hundred miles of Washington to which old James Jones is not invited, and when the old gray-uniform fellows, growing so few in number and so weak physically, after the ceremonies are over, proceed to shake hands with one another, there is one thing that none of them forgets, and that is to shake hands with old Jim Jones. The war was said to have been fought to set him free, amongst others, and whether it was fought for that purpose or not, it resulted in that. And yet he possessed that great quality of the human soul which Carlyle said is the greatest—the quality of loyalty to a leader, a leader who was his master; and not only that, after the master was dead, loyalty to his memory—that he remained a voluntary servant until the subject of his loyalty, released and free, needed him no more.

A great many of us in Mississippi and throughout the South feel a debt of gratitude to this old darky. I can not urge any logical reason for what I am asking upon the ground of his being able to render a quid pro quo. It may be that he will never be able to render efficient service. But, I repeat, is it not true that there are others, and many others, in the same fix? And if that be true, then I have a right, I think, to go out of facts a little bit and appeal to historical sentiment.

Now, do not misunderstand what I am saying. There is not a man in this Chamber nor in this broad land who would have been actuated by any feeling of unfriendliness to the old darky because he was Jeff Davis's body servant. There is not a man who would be less actuated than the Senator from Massachusetts to allow a feeling of that sort to enter into his mind. I say that for fear that some of you might think that while I am pleading for him on account of his loyalty to the great Mississippian there is an intimation on my part that that is the reason why he was sought to be discharged. Not a bit of it. That did not enter into anybody's mind at all, least of all into the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts.

That is about all the statement of his case that I can make, and I am as well aware as you are of the fact that a statement is not an argument. But it seems to me we might afford to begin economical reformations of this sort somewhere else than on this old, faithful, honored, brave, and loyal darky.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this resolution covers five places.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to give notice of an amendment to strike out that particular place. I will get it from the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Yes, from the resolution. Of course, a motion to strike out would cover that particular case. It is the last one mentioned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to defeat the whole resolution. I merely want to move that amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I understand. Mr. President, the resolution covers five places. It covers the superintendent of the folding room and the assistant postmaster. Those two places represent no work whatsoever. They do not exist as working places; they exist only as salaries. I think they ought to both be abolished, and I do not think that the Senate will question that those ought to be abolished, because there is no work done in either of them.

The case of the clerk, so called, to compile appropriations and do similar work of compilation for the Committee on Finance is held by a man who has been many years in service in that connection. The work of the Committee on Appropriations, as I stated before, is done by the clerks of that committee. So it has come down to the compilation of certain figures and tables when required for the Committee on Finance at the time of tariff consideration. That is temporary work which occurs only at intervals, and for which special provision ought to be made, but it ought not, in my judgment, to be a permanent place at $2,500 a year.

There remain the position of messenger and the position of laborer, which are held by two colored men, who, owing to illness, have done no work whatever for the last two years. The messenger who was attached to Senator Hale's committee for many years has been a most faithful and excellent man in all the performance of his duty until he fell ill.

I entirely appreciate what the Senator from Mississippi has said. We all of us respect loyalty. The loyalty of this old colored man, not merely to the man he served, but to his work when he was employed here, no one questions.

The point for the Senate to decide, and which no committee, either of the Senate or of a conference of the majority party, ought to decide for itself, is whether the Senate desires to enter upon the policy of placing on what is practically a pension roll faithful employees who have been here many years. If the Senate desires to do that, of course I shall accept their decision; but what I desire to insist on, and what those who are associated with me in this inquiry desire to insist on, is that whatever is done should be done openly and squarely, and we should know, and the public should know, exactly what happens. Men ought not to be carried on the rolls who do no work as doing work. If we think that Jones and Gaskin deserve from their long service to be retained on the rolls of the Senate and to receive an allowance or pay sufficient to support them—that is, a pension—let it be done in that way, and then the public will know, and we shall know, why it is done. But it is not right to carry names on the rolls of the Senate as performing work which is never performed, no matter who the man is or how deserving he may be.

The two cases of the assistant postmaster and the superintendent of the folding room, I take it everybody agrees with me, ought to be abolished. The third is the case of Mr. Durfee. Mr. Durfee has done and is now doing work for the Senate. It is merely a question whether it should be a permanent annual salary or whether he should be paid by temporary provision for the work that he actually performs. The other two cases—those of Gaskin and Jones—must be simply pension cases; it is nothing else.

If the Senate decides, as I said, to put those men on the superannuated roll and pay them such sum as it may see right and fit to pay, I have nothing to say; but it ought to be done in that way. No committee that has made an investigation of this subject could have been pardoned if it had not laid these facts fairly before the Senate for the Senate's decision.

I think myself that it is a very dangerous thing to enter on a civil pension list. I am opposed to it on broad, general principles. When we enter upon civil pensions, no man can tell the number of millions that it will take to meet it, because it is continuous. The numbers employed are very great, and under the pressure from outside, which we know gathers behind all these demands for pensions, it will result in a larger annual appropriation than any that has ever been made for military pensions, enormous as those are. That is my general objection to entering on the policy of civil pensions; but if in these two cases the Senate, with its eyes open, chooses to direct the Secretary of the Senate to pay these men an annual salary for their support, knowing exactly what they are doing and the public knowing exactly what is being done, I have no further word to say against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not pleading against a policy. I have no quarrel with the Senator from Massachusetts because of the resolution; I have no quarrel with the policy which the resolution indicates, but I am pleading for an exception. I do not think this peculiar kind of a case will present itself again in a hundred years. I am asking distinctly that it be made an exception, and that it be made an exception upon sentimental grounds, which seem to me to be worthy of consideration.

Mr. President, my motion is that the language in the fourth and fifth lines of the resolution, beginning with the last word in the fourth line——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending motion is that the Senate reconsider its action in passing the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us reconsider that action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Until that is done, of course, no motion to amend the resolution is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. Then, after that is done, I shall move to strike out the words "and one unemployed laborer," because that language is the language that covers Jim Jones. I shall now move to reconsider the resolution with that in view.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is pending, having been made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] on yesterday. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider the action by which the resolution was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, I move to strike out beginning with the last word on line 4 and including the first three words on line 5, the language "and one unemployed laborer."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the Senator from Mississippi in this proposition. I intend to vote for his amendment. Had the original program of what is known as the subcommittee on patronage of the committee on committees of the Republican caucus been put through unmutilated, I would not have interfered by voting for the amendment of any other Senator or have offered an amendment myself; but that program having been radically departed from, I feel at liberty to make certain exceptions to which my attention has been called and which I always thought should be made.

It seems to me that the proposition has now got down to merely one of the cheeseparing variety. The Senate roll is not the only roll of the Government where superannuated employees are retained, and I take it that no one, whether out of kindness of heart or an appreciation of past services, would desire to be brutal in the treatment of superannuated employees. Therefore I hope the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will prevail.

As to the "clerk compiling a history of revenue and general appropriation bills," I do not know of anyone employed in or about the Capitol who works harder than this individual, Mr. Durfee. I had expected—although I did not know and do not now know how it can be done—that perhaps he might be provided for in some other way; but if exceptions are to be made, I intend to ask the Senate to strike out the abolition of his place from this resolution. His work is likely to be continuous, at least for the balance of the present Congress; practically it is continuous at all times. Even if it were suspended at intervals, his valuable technical knowledge and his indefatigable industry would be lost to the Finance Committee and to the Senate were he not always available when called upon. He is engaged at the present time in work for, I suppose, half a dozen Members of the Senate who are not members of the Finance Committee, who have requested the compilation of documents or other researches requiring very great accuracy and very great industry and care and promptness in execution, for these publications to be available must be furnished promptly while the discussions to which they relate are pending.

Mr. Durfee has been connected with the Senate for some 35 years. I do not know from what State he comes; I have no relation to him except the relation of appreciation of long and faithful service under my predecessor as chairman of the Finance Committee and during the short time that I have held the position. I believe it would be a great loss to the Senate, certainly it would to the Finance Committee, if his employment were temporary, if he should drift away from Washington or into some other occupation, and suddenly next winter the work of compiling tariff statistics should be thrown on the committee. We would not then be in a position to find anyone with the peculiar ability which this gentleman possesses.

That leaves in the resolution only the unemployed messenger, which is a sentimental proposition also, embodying the case of a colored servant of one of the Senators who served longest in this body of any Senator in recent years and one whom we all admire and respect. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee reporting this resolution that he agree to strike out, beginning on line 3 with the words, "clerk, compiling a history of revenue and general appropriation bills," confining the resolution to the abolishment of the superintendent of the folding room and assistant postmaster and mail carrier.

Mr. LODGE. I am opposed to all the strikings out.

Mr. PENROSE. But if the murder is done in the open, do I understand that the Senator is willing to waive his sentimental objection?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, not at all, Mr President. I have no sentimental objection at all. The sentimental part is all the other way.

Mr. PENROSE. There is sentiment on both sides.

Mr. LODGE. If any are to go, all three should be stricken out, but I shall vote against all being stricken out. I do not believe in the policy of striking any of them out.

Mr. PENROSE. I will move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi by striking out all of the resolution after the word "carrier," in line 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On line 3, after the word "carrier," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the resolution in the following words——

Mr. PENROSE. Down to the word "laborer" in line 5.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if possible, to allow a vote to be taken upon my amendment by itself, and then the Senator can offer his amendment later.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; I am willing to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws his amendment to the amendment. The question then is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LODGE. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I ask if at this time a motion for the indefinite postponement of the resolution would be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CLAPP. Some kind of a plan is brought in here—I have not been on the inside of the matter at all—and then we start in to make one exception, and then another exception, and we make a travesty of the whole thing.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator will not make that motion. There are two offices mentioned in the resolution that ought to be abolished and the Senate has agreed to do so. We do not know that the Senate will not agree to abolish them all. I am not anticipating the exceptions until the Senate has voted, and I hope the Senator will withhold his motion, at least until we can vote on the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator what is the use of these periodical efforts to do something along this line, and then, when the effort is made, first one exception is proposed and then another, until we get back to just about where we started?

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator that the exceptions should not be made, but if the resolution should only provide for the abolition of the two offices for which there is an aggregate of four or five thousand dollars paid in salaries and no work done, it would be worth while to accomplish that much, if the Senate can not bring itself to do the whole thing.

Mr. CLAPP. Then we should have done a rank injustice to those whom we have stricken off for the simple reason that they do not happen to have someone here of sufficient influence to maintain them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That does not follow if they have the same exceptional reason in their favor.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Minnesota will allow me a moment, I do not think he quite understands the situation. In regard to the assistant postmaster, we abolish an office which nobody fills except in name.

Mr. CLAPP. Does he draw a salary?

Mr. LODGE. He is performing the duties of a messenger and he is retained as a messenger. He is not removed; he is retained in the office which he now fills. In the other case, the office is occupied nominally by a man who is detailed to the service of a Senator. He performs no duties as superintendent of the folding room because there are no duties to perform in that office.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. If we abolish that office that man can be replaced in another position or be attached to a committee. In those two cases no hardship is done to anyone, and we ought to get rid of those two vacant offices, carrying salaries, as I remember, of about $4,500 in the aggregate. The other three cases, as has been stated, are largely sentimental. It is a disagreeable position to take and no one would take it voluntarily; but in the interest of the public service, of proper accounting, and of the proper transaction of business, those three offices ought to be abolished.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator in charge of the resolution. To vote upon one of these questions at a time is hardly the right way, I think, to dispose of the matter, because either none of the offices should be abolished or more than one should be; and I want to suggest to the Senator for his consideration whether it would not be better to offer a substitute for the resolution which would abolish the two offices which he has particularly mentioned and the propriety of abolishing which no one questions.

Mr. LODGE. There is no need of doing that. I am against the exceptions that are proposed. Let us take a vote on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to amend. If it prevails—and I hope it will not prevail—then the case mentioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the case of Senator Hale's messenger ought also to be excepted. I should then vote to except them, because it would be rank injustice to do anything else; but that is not to be determined until after the first amendment is determined. After that, if the other exceptions are made, the resolution will at least provide for abolishing the two offices which the Senate has agreed should be abolished. There is no point in offering a substitute now.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Massachusetts says, although I am in sympathy with him, I will say that I am opposed to this eternal coming in here with some idea of reform and then gradually taking the foundation out from under it. If there could be some age limit, some definite proposition that did not leave it to the prestige of some Senator who might want to protect some old superannuated employee who was doing nothing but drawing a salary, I would not object to some basis of that kind; but I do not think it is right to discharge men who do not have any influence and retain those who happen to have influence when there is no work for either of them to do and neither of them would be able to do work if there were work for them. But rather than confuse the parliamentary situation I will not press the motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was a member of the subcommittee——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa pardon an interruption for just a second?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am just informed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] that Jim Jones told him the other day that he was getting better and stronger and that he thought he would be able to come back to work soon. That may have something to do with the decision of the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was, with the Senator from Massachusetts, a member of the subcommittee which considered these questions. We believed that whatever might be the policy of the Senate with regard to a pension roll, it was due to the country that we be honest and fair and square with it, and so arrange our pay rolls that those who looked at them would know whether we were paying men for what it was there alleged they were doing or whether we were paying men for something else or paying them for doing nothing whatever.

I have not the same objection to a civil-service pension roll that my friend from Massachusetts may have. I believe that in some form or other it will be necessary before long for the United States to adopt some plan of superannuation, merely for the efficiency of the service; but I am not willing, so far as my voice and my vote are concerned, to allow it to appear that we are paying men when they are doing nothing whatsoever, or paying them for doing one thing, when in fact the record shows that they are employed for another thing. If it were to come to the question of composing a system here by which provision should be made for the old and the faithful and the efficient employees of the Senate who had worn themselves out in its service and in the performance of their duties, I believe that I would be in favor of giving them something upon which they might support themselves in the last years of their lives. But this is a pretext——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. What better right has a man who has held a position for a long time and drawn a salary that is a full compensation for his services to ask the taxpayers of this country to support him than the taxpayers who have never received a salary have to ask the Government to support them in their old age?

Mr. CUMMINS. No better, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. Then if we treat everybody that way, where will the Government get the money?

Mr. CUMMINS. A civil-service pension, however, is not bottomed upon mere generosity or philanthropy. A civil-service pension is based upon the belief that it increases efficiency, and, so far as my investigation has gone, I believe it to be true that we could pension thousands of the civil-service employees in the city of Washington now and every year save money by so doing.

Now, mark you, I am not in favor of the civil-service plan without any contribution from the employees themselves. But somehow or other, sometime, we will be compelled, in my opinion, to introduce that system in the service of the United States. But that is not the question. I am simply expressing that in answer to the argument or view of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It is not proposed here to establish a pension roll, and I am opposed to establishing a pension roll by indirection. I am opposed to allowing men to remain upon the active rolls of the Senate upon the presumption that they are doing work for the public, when, in fact, they are doing nothing whatsoever and are incapable of doing anything whatsoever. I am opposed to allowing a man to remain ostensibly as historian of a certain committee here, when it is a mere figure of speech. His services may be valuable, it is true, but if they are they can be hired for what the services are in fact worth, and they can be paid for according to the service rendered.

The whole idea of the committee was that we should be open, fair, and candid not only with the Senators but with the country. We found certain men who were not performing any service, and had not been for a series of years, and could not perform any service, and we believed that unless the Senate wanted to establish a pension roll their positions ought to be abolished.

We found, for instance, the superintendent of the folding room, a man—I am not disparaging him at all; he bore that title—who had a salary of $2,160 a year, as I remember it, and he had not rendered any service whatsoever to the Sergeant at Arms or the Government as a whole, but has been detailed to the service of a particular Senator under a custom that has prevailed here for some time past.

I am not to be understood as criticizing that, because it has been a custom for a long time, a custom which I think ought to be abolished. This resolution, therefore, provides that that place be abolished. We ought no longer to continue to pay the man for doing things he is not doing, occupying a position he does not occupy.

In the same way with the deputy postmaster. There is no deputy postmaster. The man who holds the title of deputy postmaster is a messenger. He is performing good service, and ought to be paid for his service as messenger; but he ought not to be paid upon the hypothesis that he is a deputy postmaster.

It seems to me we ought not to make any exceptions to this resolution. If we want to keep these men, such of them as are rendering no service, let us do it in a fair and open way. If we want to employ the estimable gentleman referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] for the work desired, let us employ him and pay him according to the value of his services. But do not let us continue the farce of carrying him upon the roll as a historian, or something of that character, when he is rendering a very different service to the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. The description of his duties in the appropriation bill comes about as near describing them—unless you make a paragraph of them—compilation of revenue matters and appropriation bills.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the Finance Committee employing a man to help it. It has a good many men in its employ; possibly too many; possibly not enough. I am now entirely willing, and always have been, to accept the judgment of the chairman of the Finance Committee with regard to the number of employees. But I am not willing that we shall be apparently doing one thing while we are in fact doing another. I hope if we want to provide for the last days of this old negro, who has distinguished himself, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, by peculiar service to his master, that we will not do it by carrying him upon the rolls as a laborer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would be inclined to vote for the retention of this old imbecile upon the pay rolls of the Government, but the man who has shown himself to be capable of making a contest for his own enslavement can not be very valuable. I do not know what salary he is drawing, but it is hardly worth while to take a half hour of the Senate's time over it. He seems to have been found capable in the judgment of preceding Senates to perform some service for a given salary. Upon that record I might feel inclined, I think I would feel inclined, to vote against his being taken out.

But the other record does not appeal to me. I would not object to the Government employing an old horse which had been employed on the other side in the war, because the horse was not responsible, and this kind of a human being is not responsible. As I say, a man who would actually contend in favor of his own enslavement is not entitled to a very high place among even animals. But he seems to have found something in it. After years of enslavement it is hardly to be expected that a man is one of cool judgment capable of taking care of himself.

I do not imagine we are going to start in upon a policy of pensioning men because they acted in connection with an attempt to destroy the Government. But I would allow him to go on the list because he has been serving in a position in connection with the Senate and perhaps performing duties commensurate with what he received.

If I vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, I want it understood that that is the ground upon which I vote, and not because he has been going around for years boasting that he was the custodian and the only person who knew where the seal of the assumed government that was attempted to be set up in the South was, when, as a matter of fact, historians tell us he never even saw the seal. He would not know the seal from a yellow dog if he saw it. Cast your mind back to the days 40 years ago or more and think what this man knew about the issues. Merely because he happened to be a servant of the leader of that lost cause he comes here now and claims some special virtue by it. It would be more appropriate——

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has claimed no virtue.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know. I do not want to get into a controversy about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator does not want to get into a controversy, he should not make such statements.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely want, when I vote for the Senator's amendment, to be certain not to leave a mistaken impression on the mind of anybody as to why I do it. If this man has been helpless and has been heretofore able to earn the compensation attached to the position which he occupies, I would vote to retain him on the pay roll for that purpose and not because of any glory attached to an infamous history.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me? That last expression almost moves me to desist from even asking the question which I was about to ask.
